This is a brilliant piece of acting, but is dwarfed by the fury of Sal, when she is left alone with her cousin Sue. She turns on the intruder, drives her from the house with inflamed frenzy, hurls her belongings after her and falls exhausted against the door.

A year later Jake is released from prison and makes his way to his mountain home, bent upon killing his wife. Arriving at the cabin he looks in the window, and then creeps cautiously through the door, holding a large club in his hand, as he sees his wife sitting in a chair unaware of his presence. Just as he raises the club to strike her he sees for the first time his infant child, which his wife holds tenderly to her bosom. She kisses the child and lifts it up so it looks into its father's face. He drops the cudgel and kneels reverently at his wife's feet, asks her if she can forgive him. She does; his heart is touched and his nature seems transformed and purified. This is a climax that rends every emotion of tenderness in our being and acts like a benediction of peace to our souls.

ESSANAY CO.

"A FORTUNATE MISFORTUNE."—A feature in our list of recent Wednesday releases. A comedy drama by the new Essanay Chicago stock company. A story of gripping human interest with an appeal to every heart. Don't miss it.

Frank Wellthy has just become engaged to the pretty Vivian Marlow, and the event is pleasantly celebrated when he informs his club friends of his good fortune in winning the belle of the city's fashionable smart set. Frank is also considered a good catch, as he is rich, handsome and the idol of the society world.

The next evening at the reception given by Frank to Vivian and his friends, where the engagement is formally announced, a telegram is received by the young man with the news that, owing to unfortunate speculations, he is a ruined man. Stunned, the message drops from his hands, and soon the news of his failure is whispered from one to another of the guests, and all hastily leave.

The next morning an auction is held at which all the household furniture is sold. The servants bid him a tearful farewell and Frank is left alone in despair, save for James, his faithful valet, who refuses at first to leave his master. The scene is here interrupted by the entrance of the burly iceman, but Frank informs him that his establishment will no longer need ice. The iceman expresses his regret, but not informed of Frank's complete failure, asks him to buy tickets to the iceman's ball. Frank smiles and lays out his last two dollars, assuring the iceman he will be glad to attend the ball.

The evening of the ball Frank, who has fallen into the depths of despair, resolves that he will seek diversion in actually attending the event to which he has tickets. After a really pleasant evening he returns to his rooms, while the face of a young lady, whose name he remembers as Fanny Parker, haunts him in his dreams.

The next morning finds him looking for work, He is about to give up disheartened when he meets his former iceman, to whom he tells his unfortunate circumstances and inquires if he would be likely to obtain a job with the ice company were he to apply.

Inquiry at the company's office results favorably and Frank, armed with a pair of ice tongs, is put on the wagon. At one of the houses where he delivers ice he is pleasantly surprised to meet the young lady whose acquaintance he had made the previous evening. After a short visit Frank is invited to call again.

The days go by and Frank, finding he is earnestly in love with Fanny, proposes and is accepted. Later they are established in a small cottage as happy as two larks, both confident of a radiant future before them.

The next day is pay day, and with it comes a new change in Frank and Fanny's lives. James, Frank former valet, enters the ice company's office while Frank is in line and joyfully thrusts a newspaper into his hands. The news concerns the tremendous rise of certain mining stock which Frank has a good portion, but which he had for a long time thought worthless.

The following scenes show Frank and Fanny established in new quarters and entertaining their friends. An amusing scene closes the film when callers are announced. The cards bear the names of Mrs. Marlow and her daughter, Vivian. Frank remembers the rebuffs he had received after the crash he had called on Vivian and her mother, only to have his card returned with the words "not at home" written across the face of it, and he returns the cards through James with the same message written on it.

After a long jaunt they come upon the sorrowing widow's mansion, and believing it to be Heaven, ask if their mama is there. The artless sincerity of the little ones impresses the woman so that she adopts them to fill the void in her heart caused by the loss of her own child.

GEORGE KLEINE, Selling Agent for Chicago, (52 State Street, Chicago, Ill.)

"A WESTERNER'S WAY."—A vivid picture that shows there is honor among some thieves and that the game of outlawry can be played fairly and squarely. Thrilling, intensely dramatic; a photoplay you will feature.

Jason Watkins, a real estate and loan agent, enters his office in the little Arizona town of Navajo, to find that during the night robbers have visited the place and broken into his safe, taking with them a large sum of money and other valuables.

Watkins immediately notifies the sheriff; a posse is hurriedly organized and a search made for the culprits. However, their search is unfruitful, and Sheriff Wells dismisses the posse and rides on to a neighboring town.

In the meantime Big Bill Hastings, the robber, who has hidden in the hills until satisfied the posse has given up the chase, has examined his loot and stowed it away in his shirt bosom. For the first time in twenty-four hours he has thought of food, and now finding his inner man crying to be fed, he mounts his horse and cautiously rides down the trail.

A few hours later he enters a gambling house in the town to which the sheriff has also ridden, eats and drinks, and after turning the roulette wheel a few times just to test his luck, saunters out, and into the arms of Sheriff Dixon. The sheriff recognizes him and draws his gun before Big Bill has recognized his pursuer.

Bill submits to the arrest good naturedly, and goes with the sheriff to the hotel, where they must wait for a morning train back to Navajo. The evening drags slowly and the sheriff suggests that they visit the gambling house just to pass the time away.

At the table the sheriff sits down just for a friendly game or two, though he is warned by Bill that he is likely to get cleaned. The sheriff plays and loses, and unmindful of Bill's advice lays out more chips on the table. Bill yawns and stalks to the door, and turning to the sheriff says: "I am going to bed, sheriff; I will be there when you come."

In the West in the early days a man's word was as good as his bond, and despite the fact that Big Bill would probably serve a long sentence if found guilty the sheriff knew the bad man would keep his word.

Later Sheriff Wells, stripped of his money, and of Jason Watkins' money, which he had taken off his prisoner, enters his room at the hotel. Bill is there, sleeping peacefully, but awakens when the door closes. The sheriff confesses his loss of the money. Bill listens silently and finally tells the sheriff to go to bed.

Shortly after when the sheriff has dropped off to a restless sleep, Bill slips a weapon from the sheriff's belt and slips out of the room.

The next scene shows him stealthily entering the gambling house, where the proprietor, alone, is counting up the day's receipts. He is masked and the proprietor is unable to recognize him, though his intentions are easily apprehended. In the end Big Bill leaves with the stolen money, gambled away by the sheriff, and returns them to him. The sheriff, glad to get the money back, allows his prisoner to go after exacting a promise of reformation from him.

KALEM CO.

'THE ROUGH RIDER'S ROMANCE."—Lovers of the military drama will find an unusually interesting story in the Kalem release of Wednesday, November 2nd, entitled "The Rough Rider's Romance." The story is supposed to have taken place during the Cuban War and the hero is a young cavalryman, who goes to war and leaves a sweetheart behind promising to return and claim her at the close of the war. During a spirited engagement, as shown in the picture, the young man is seriously wounded. When taken to the field hospital the surgeon in charge gives him up as a hopeless case, but a young army nurse thinks that she can save him by persistent and faithful attentiton, and succeeds in doing so. During his convalescence the young soldier realizes that the pretty nurse has grown very fond of him and also learns from the surgeon that he owes his life to her. Moved both by gratitude and affection he becomes betrothed to the nurse and marries her. When he returns to his old home with his bride he is confronted by his former sweetheart, and for the time being almost forgets what he owes to his young wife, indeed, he is about to desert her when there is an occurrence which brings back a flood of memories and he puts aside his old love for good. A striking feature of the picture is a cavalry action which reproduces in military form one of the best known engagements of the Cuban War.

"SILVER CLOUD'S SACRIFICE."—The Kalem Company's Indian picture for Friday, November 4th, is entitled "Silver Cloud's Sacrifice," and is one of the best of the Kalem Indian series. The story centers around two young Indian girls, sisters, the younger of whom has fallen in love with one white trapper against the wishes of the chief, her father. It is only through the aid of the elder sister that the white man is able to win his Indian bride, but in bringing about this result the older sister loses her life. There is a strong dramatic situation in this theme and the drama is put on with all the attention to detail which has characterized Kalem's popular Indian dramas in the past.

"BOTH WERE STUNG; OR, THE THIRD MAN WON."—A pretty young girl pays a visit to her aunt, the latter having two sons who work their mother's farm. When they see their cousin the result is magical; they both fall head-over-heels in love. The next morning their toilet is most carefully made, each producing some article which scores over the other.

Sibley, with his full force on the way, troops were rushed to the scene of the conflict. As the long line of soldiers appeared, coming over the prairie, the Indians put up a strong fight but were eventually driven off."

While stacking hay during the afternoon, one of them is suddenly taken ill, and betakes himself to the house The plot not being very deep is understood by his brother, who, five minutes later also appears, having apparently run the haying fork through his leg. Their intentions, however, are rudely frustrated, for the two ladies make the invalids comfortable, and go off to finish the haying. The last scene shows how the waiting game pays, for the girl is seen in a quiet spot embracing a third man, the two brothers being hidden onlookers.

"PICTURESQUE MAJORCA IN THE MEDITERRANEAN."—A perfectly photographed panorama of all the worth-while places on this, the largest of the Balearic Islands, which lies south and east of Spain.

A combination of scenic and educational views produced in the usual perfect manner of this concern. This film presents all the native activities in a perfectly clear manner and shown under such ideal conditions as to make exceptionally pleasing pictures of events which partake of an industrial tone.

Tours of this kind seem to be making decided gains in popular favor.

These fascinating scenes form a travel film of pictorial variety and beauty made in a locality out of the usual path of the cinematographer.

"THE FISHING SMACK."—A pretty story of a fisherman's affection for the old craft in which for years he has battled with the storms.

It has come to be unnecessary for us to state that costuming and staging are always absolutely correct and the best that can be obtained for each production.

The action of this story takes place in a quaint fishing settlement. The docks are lined with crafts of many kinds while the nets piled and spread on the shore serve to put us immediately into the spirit of the village.

An old fisherman is very ill and has but little money to provide for himself and his daughter.

A young sailor of the neighborhood proposed to buy his old boat, but the old fisherman refuses, for he feels he had rather suffer than to part with it.

When his illness grows his daughter finds it impossible to buy the medicine her father needs; and without his knowing it, she sells the boat to the young sailor—who immediately puts his name in place of Loik's.

But the old man often thinks of his boat and one day, taking advantage of his daughter's absence, he goes to the harbor to see it.

His disappointment is great when he sees his name has been taken off and replaced by the names of Yves. The owner, arriving, explains to the old man that his daughter sold him the boat.

In despair he returns to his home where his daughter explains to him her reason for selling the boat, but he says he would prefer dying to separation from his old boat.

Yves, arriving at that moment, tells the old fisherman to take back his boat but to give him his daughter in exchange, for he loves her.

The maiden, consulted, accepts the proposal with pleasure and happiness comes back to the fisher's home.

"CROSSING THE ANDES."—The picture gives a clear impression of the wild and desolate country of this region. Caravans of mules are seen making their arduous way across the rocky slopes. So hard is the going that most of the animals are lame. A view of interest is a bronze statue of Christ, which marks the site of a declaration of peace between two contending armies.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

"TRAGICAL CONCEALMENT."—Pursued by Republican soldiers, the Marquis of Rochebrune is fortunate enough to arrive safely at his castle, but the hussars are on the track and soon invade the castle.

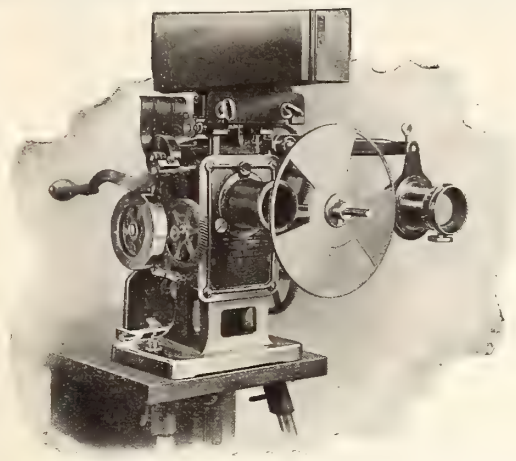
The Marchioness then hides her husband in a secret closet built into the drawing room wall, and shuts the false door. The hiding place cannot be opened from the inside, and, as the Marchioness and her maid servant are arrested by the hussars, the Marquis is left to a seemingly certain death by suffocation.

In her prison this thought haunts the Marchioness until her maid servant sees with horror that her mistress has become mad.

During this time the Marquis has been imprisoned, and despite his efforts cannot be heard by the few servants that still live in the castle. His dog, however, scents his master, and by its barking attracts attention to the secret door, and the Marquis is released.

Hearing that the Marchioness is imprisoned, the Marquis assembles the peasants and rushes to the prison. The crowd forces the doors and rescues the prisoners. But even the sight of her husband does not make any change in the mind of the Marchioness. She is apparently hopelessly mad.

The Marquis then, when his wife is brought again to the castle, places himself again in the hiding place, and appears suddenly to the eyes of the Marchioness. The scheme succeeds and the shock is so great that the Marchioness awakes from her slumber with her reason restored.



Power's Cameragraph No. 6

THE PERFECT MOTION PICTURE MACHINE

Wins in competition with the leading makes of the world

Messrs. W. J. Morgan and J. A. Hayden of the J. D. Williams Amusement Co., Sydney, Australia, came to New York for the purpose of securing the Australian agency for Power's moving picture machines. Negotiations were concluded and an order placed for 50 No. 6 machines for immediate shipment.

Heretofore, European machines have been in the majority in that country, with a few installations of American made machines.

This order was not placed hastily, or without weighing carefully the mechanical features of the machine and the flickerless, steady pictures projected by it. When so far away from the source of supplies, a breakdown is fatal. Substantial construction and reliability count for much more than they do in this country, where supplies can be quickly obtained.

Six months ago two Power's Cameragraphs No. 6 were shipped to them and their wonderfully strong and enduring construction, especially the new and original form of intermittent movement which does away with the delicate star wheel and pinwheel, created a profound impression.

As soon as the machines could be carefully tested and given a practical demonstration in Sydney's leading theatre, Mr. J. D. Williams cabled for the Australian agency, negotiations for which have just been concluded as stated above.

It should be a source of great pride to all American exhibitors and operators that the genius of Mr. Nicholas Power has produced a machine which is acknowledged to be the perfection of mechanical construction, and is the choice of particular exhibitors throughout the world.

We quote as follows, from an advertisement of the J. D. Williams Amusement Co., which appeared in "The Referee," the leading newspaper of Sydney, Australia, September 21st, 1910:

"We have the largest consignment of picture machines now on the water that ever came to Australia. We are the sole and exclusive agents for the POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH, a picture machine that has always been the best ever since the picture business has been in existence. We are positive of this fact, and to make good we will sell one of these machines on one week's trial, and if they don't give satisfaction in every way return them and they will not cost you one penny. After a competition in our exhibit room with five other picture machines, six of the best moving picture operators in Sydney pronounced the Power's machine to be absolutely the best machine in the world."

AUSTRALIAN LETTER.

the Biograph, Vitagraph, and also Selig and Essanay have come to the front over here the last few months is little short of marvelous.

The J. D. Williams Company, Limited, has increased its capital to $500,000 and is at the present time building a fine theatre right opposite the present place. As the papers put it, they are working three shifts a day in "Yankee fashion" to get it up and open on Boxing Day (Dec. the 26th). I guess that they will do it, as they are the sort to get there all the time. They have got busy and have sent a representative to Manilla in the Philippine Islands to open up a film exchange there. Mr. J. D. Hayden left four weeks ago to open up the London office to keep the firm in close touch with the latest of European productions, and others have gone to various parts of the Commonwealth for the purpose of opening up branches of the International Film Exchange. I guess with their customary hustle and sticktoitness, that they will soon be a firm that the others will have to reckon with in the business. I look on Mr. J. D. W. as a natural money getter, and I think there are thousands of others on this side who have the same ideas as I have in the matter.

I have it on very good authority that Williams will build in other cities and get some of the "golden googies" that are floating round loose on this side of the water; and there is good money to be made here by any one, who has got the capital and the hustle in them, as they have. I hold no brief for Mr. Williams, and he does not known that I have mentioned in this letter anything about him, but I have seen letters from the United States from bankers and others commending him to the Australian bankers for his honesty and integrity, and I love to see a man that hustles, as they all do, to get what we are all striving after.

Mr. Williams has expended thousands of dollars on the New Colonial Theatre, and he is all the time doing something to still further the comfort and pleasure of his thousands of patrons daily. The latest addition, is the installation of a goodly number of large electric fans that keeps the house cool and well ventiated, in day time especially, when the sliding roofs have to be closed to produce the necessary darkness for the showing of the pictures, and as his show is going from eleven a. m. to eleven at night, he has to keep the place well ventilated and the air pure, otherwise the vast crowds would make the place oppressively hot. Now it is a pleasure to sit there in comfort, and with a temperature that does not remind you of what awaits us at some future time to come.

FROM ANOTHER CORRESPONDENT.

Sydney, N. S. W.

Picture shows are a great factor in the amusement of the people throughout the commonwealth, and the Lyceum, under the direction of C. Spencer, is one huge success; it is a capacious building, capable of holding over 2,300, and is a permanent institution. A varied program is presented every week, the present one is as follows: "Oh, that Hat," "Apache Gold," "Yarra Speed Trial,' "Romeo and Juliet in Our Town," "Tunny Fishing," "Foolhead as Chauffer," "Regetta on McKong," "Convict 796," "When Mama Is Out," "Bootles Baby," "Tontolini at the Restaurant," besides a great local production by Mr. Spencer's experts of The Schools of Demonstration, in which about 10,000 children took part, and 50,000 people were present on the occasion. The press and public were highly eulogistic of this and the program generally.

The hiring and selling departments are kept busy at Spencer's Theatrescope Co., which is equipped with a large and competent staff. The factory is also kept busy. Mr. Spencer includes in his weekly program as great a variety of makers as he possibly can, which is generally about 8,000 feet, and never misses an opportunity to introduce effects, at no matter what cost to insure realism, to the makers' art.

West Picture Co., Ltd., after a season at the Palace theatre, have resumed occupation of the Glaciarium—a large hall with a capacity of 3,000, and is well patronized. They also present weekly and varied programs of many makers; they have a fine orchestra which is a feature of the entertainment. They have also the Bijou, near the Central Railway station and in close proximity to Glaciarium and shows in almost every center of the continent. They and Spencer's are the premier establishments.

The Victoria Hall, Pitt street and Empire, Oxford street, are minor show houses holding from 900 to 1,000 and present fairly good programs to fairly good business. The Colonial Theatre, George street, is run by the Williams syndicate, with continuous shows daily at 3d. and 6d. There are several new houses in course of construction in the city of Sydney.

Mr. Spencer's Lyric Theatre, which will set 2,000, is in rapid completion. This building, with its handsome standard front, will be fitted with all the modern improvement for cinematography and being on the cantilever principal, there will be no obstruction for the sight views; it will be run in conjunction with the Lyceum, for which he holds a long lease. Separate programs will be presented at each house.

Melbourne, Victoria.

The Olympic, under the agency of Spencer Theatrescope Co., is the largest in the world for picture shows, with its seating capacity of 5,000. This is fitted up with the latest improvements, where business is recorded big—being crowded nightly.

West's Ltd. are in close quarters with their large hall called West's Building with its holding of 3,000, and which is patronized well by the public. Each of the before mentioned present weeky programs of the latest films. There are besides the above several pictures in the city and suburbs.

Newcastle, N. S. W.

The principal picture show house is the Crystal Hall, run by Disc and Baker and their following is great, reporting big business nightly. They put on a fine program and are a permanent institution.

Queensland.

Virch and Carroll, Sydney Cook and West Ltd. have the running of this state and all write me business is good.

Adelaide.

West Ltd. are a fixture, William Lennon, Hyman and Lennon are making the pace on the picture business in the southern state.

Amongst the hiring and selling houses Spencer's Theatrescope Co. hold their own. Gaumont Co. are opening branches in principal centers and Pathe Freres are well established also.

INCREASING DEMAND FOR POWER'S CAMERAGRAPHS.

The popularity of Power's Cameragraph No. 6 has so increased the sales of the Nicholas Power Company that they have had to increase their manufacturing facilities and double the capacity of their plant. They report that in spite of this increased capacity the orders keep pouring in so fast that it is almost impossible to make prompt deliveries.

One pleasing feature in connection with this business is that the machines are making good wherever used. Experienced operators and exhibitors who have used the No. 6 machine are loud in its praise.

After severe competition with several machines made in Europe, the Nicholas Power Co. received an ney, Australia, for fifty No. 6 cameragraphs for imorder from the J. D. Williams Amusement Co., Sidmediate shipment.

CHICAGO LETTER

Freres, tells me that he received recently a copy of an ordinance, just passed by the City Council of Los Angeles, which contains a special clause regulating the display of moving picture and other posters. The ordinance prohibits the inclusion of deadly weapons of any kind in the pictorial work, or the depiction of the commission of any criminal acts. Any violation of these provisions will be punished by fine and imprisonment.

Mr. Linn has also been informed that other municipalities throughout California have obtained copies of the Los Angeles ordinance, with a view of adopting it, or something similar, in the near future.

The poster companies throughout the United States will do well to note carefully this action of the Los Angeles authorities, and its expected imitation by other California cities.

Cubs' Defeat Moves Manager Powell.

My friend, A. Powell, manager of the Ideal theatre, Kokomo, Ind., has been at it again. At what? "Pome" making.

On the night of Thursday, Oct. 20, after learning that the Cubs had received their third consecutive drubbing, Manager Powell had the following verses thrown on the screen by means of slides:

THE SITUATION.

Upon one time there were some Cubs,
Who through Us Fans sent joyous throbs;
But who, this night, will lie awake
With these same throbs turned to an ache.
? ? ? ? ? ?
Answer: These selfsame Fans.

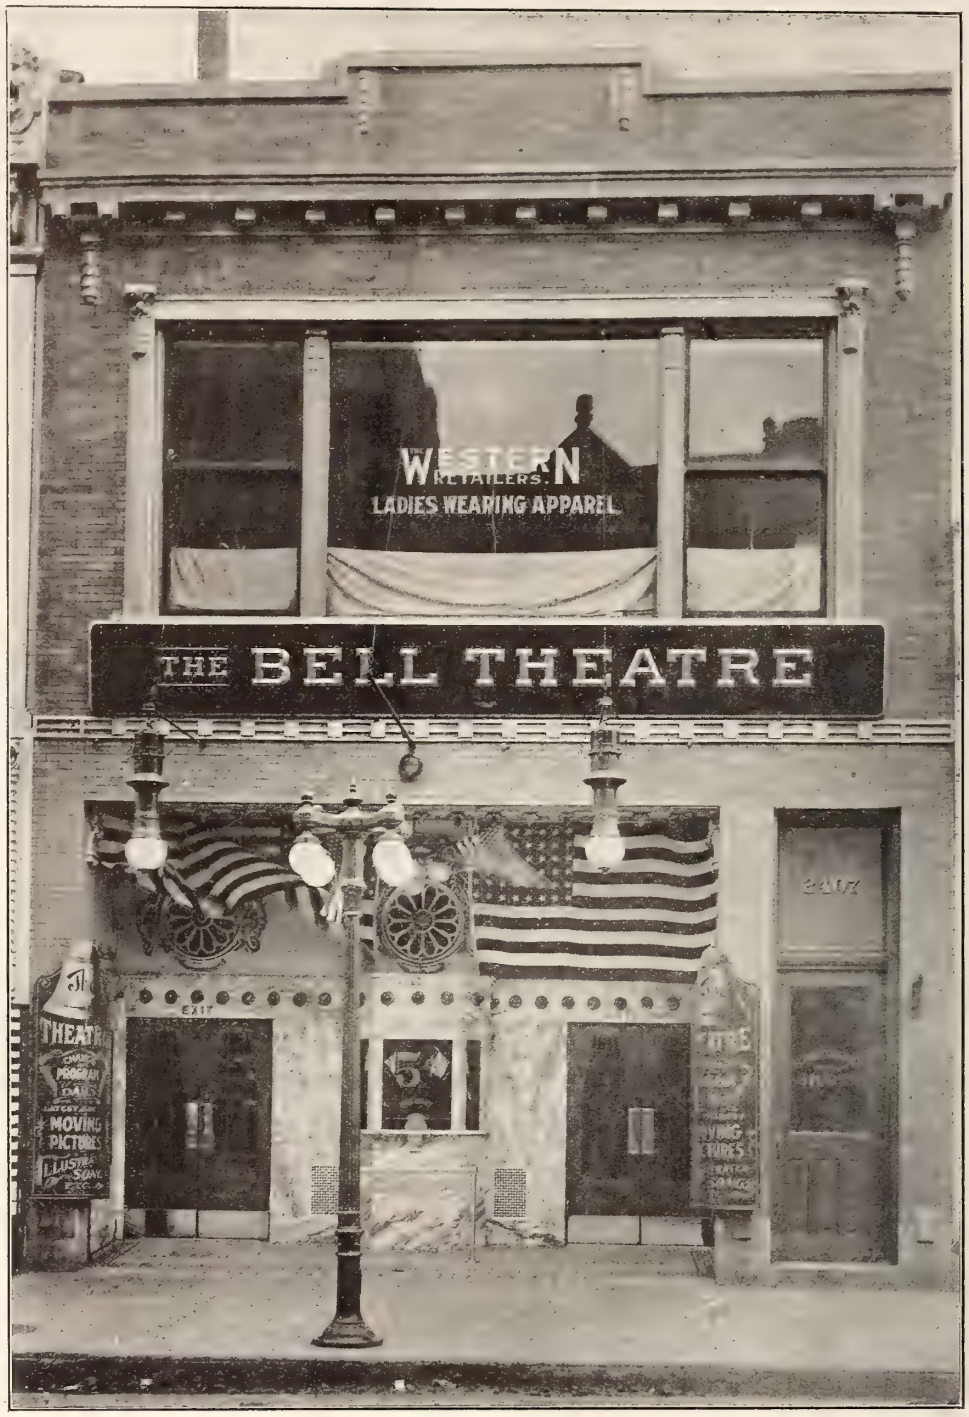
Yet, though quite blue the situation,
There is some hope, some consolation.
We'll show you here in photoplay
How Phillies of the Cubs made hay.

When ? ? ? ? ? ?
Pretty soon; soon enuf.

My congratulations to Manager Powell. He knows how to stir up interest in a coming feature film.

The Bell Theatre.

One of the most handsome theatres on West Madison street, both for architectural beauty and for the chasteness of its interior decorations, the Bell is also widely known for its uniformly large and lucrative business and for the excellence of the projection of the pictures shown. It was built over a year ago, with a capacity of 400, and cost $20,000. Its solid white marble front attracts the attention of passers-by during the day hours, and, at night, it is brilliantly lighted by many hundred of incandescent lamps. The comfort of patrons was one of the main things aimed at when the plan and appointments were being arranged, and no house in the city has better seating facilities, a fine type of chair being contracted for with the well known firm of A. H. Andrews Co., of this city. Licensed pictures have been always used in the Bell, two new reels being used daily —a first run and a second. Vaudeville has never been used on a single program since the house opened, the management being confident from the start that a high quality film service would best please their patrons. The capacity is always taxed to accommodate those in attendance, and it frequently happens that a house fully twice the present size would be required to admit them. Any manager who wishes to test the projecting quality of his pictures would do well to attend the Bell at any time, and the lesson learned will tend to center greater attention and care on the operating room of his house. William H. Bell, and his son, John Bell, are the owners, the management being in the special charge of the latter. It is needless to state that the Bell gives its shows at all times in a well lighted auditorium.



BELL THEATRE, CHICAGO, ILL.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Percy Waters, General Manager of the General Film Co., paid Chicago a flying visit last week.

P. M. Riley, manager of the Princess, Hammond, Ind., was seen at the offices of the General Film Co., 77 S. Clark Street, last week. He is well pleased with the business done at his house, which is the leading picture theatre in Hammond.

Arthur V. Smith, treasurer of the Films Pub. Co., New York, Mrs. Smith and baby, also Miss Maud Heyl, of San Francisco, remained over in Chicago until Monday, Oct. 24, as guests of Mr. and Mrs. John B. Rock. The interest in the Cubs-Athletics series proved too strong a magnet for Mr. Smith, who had intended leaving the Monday previous.

The Arrow, a new theatre costing $8,500.00, and one of the prettiest and most up-to-date houses on the North Side, will be completed and in readiness for opening Thanksgiving Day, Thursday, Nov. 25. Nohing but high class licensed film will be used in the entertainment. The Arrow will seat 300 people, and the best modern equipment has been provided for the comfort and convenience of patrons. The owners are John Colson and Harold A. Hill, the latter filling the position of manager.

The demand for the Pathe American product is increasing from week to week, so the Western manager of that firm, K. W. Linn, informs me. Mr. Linn receives numerous letters from exchanges, as well as exhibitors, praising the American subjects highly. He also tells me that the Pathe Professional machine is not only holding its own, but is gaining in popularity. When I called the other day, Mr. Linn informed me that the office was entirely stripped of machines, so heavy has been the demand for the past two months. Liberal shipments are made regularly each month to machine agents in San Francisco.

The Short Cut

This is no age for lost motion---not in the picture game. It's a case of using every minute the theatre is open to get people in and out of the chairs. It's a case of taking every short cut and saving every moment's time.

Now get this thought, run your shows rapidly, fill and empty your house often, but---give Quality Entertainment. Fight for time, economize by using a machine that will keep right every moment.

PHOTOPLAY AND PLAYWRIGHT.

editors and the board of censors to provide a loin-cloth, or worse still, hack away portions of its anatomy altogether. This latter painful treatment is "for the good of public morals," though every month in print magazine writers may wade to their bellies in blood, while they use shameless women, robbers, thieves and libertines for their story pawns. What a volume of wrath the scenario writer would bring down on his luckless head were he to allow any of these very interesting individuals to stray into the story he sends to the photoeditor! Far be it from the average photoplaywright to ask for vicious or immoral latitudes, but spice has ever been to fiction what salt is to the earth and the pasteurized photoplay of the present is anaemic from loss of red corpuscles.

All in all, however, photo story writing is a charming game even with fancy chain-curbed and no laurels in sight. A better time for the playwright may be at hand. To-day we are apparently the last consideration of the manufacturer. Meanwhile, we will strive with all our cunning to artfully weave our scripts with the hope that the last shall eventually be first.

Forest Kerrens, of The Star Theatre, Butler, Mo., writes The Film Index to say that he is more pleased with licensed films to-day than ever. He calls attention to an advertisement in the local paper of an independent house which is still featuring old Biograph and Essanay subjects and says, that even the independent exhibitor knows a good thing when he sees it. As Mr. Kerrens is running licensed pictures only, he considers that the best ad. he can have for his house is the featuring of licensed pictures by the independent house, as he has the advantage of showing the latest.

WASHINGTON TIMES INVESTIGATION

Report of Dr. W. C. Woodward, District Health Officer

It would be unsafe to pass final judgment on the efficiency of the ventilation of the several 5-cent theatres visited, as the night was warm and doors and windows necessarily open. With a single exception, however, all of them were free from objectionable odor. In the one excepted place, the odor was suggstive of the need of the vigorous application of hot water, washing soda, and the scrubbing brush rather than the need of more fresh air. From my general knowledge of this question, I believe that the ventilation of the 5-cent theatres of the city would compare not unfavorably with the ventilation of the more pretentious establishments, the theatres generally. The pictures were generally clear, and with a minimum of the flickering that is so trying on the eyes.

No exception could be taken to the conduct of any of the people congregated in any of the places visited, either during the performance or while coming or going. The general impression was that of refined, orderly persons, out for a brief period of amusement and instruction. The scrupulous care with which the proprietor of one place tendered return checks because he was unable to complete the performance, owing to the lack of electric current, and with the proprietor of another establishment, although he invited the party to enter, declined to accept any price for admission because the last performance was half over, speaks well for the honesty of the management.

It is more difficult to form a proper judgment with respect to the moral and intellectual influence of the pictures shown. The portrayal of one attempted assassination, although thwarted by a child's love; one seduction, although followed by the usual misery consequent upon such a sin; and one planned-for assignation, although the villain was thwarted, was hardly necessary for the moral uplift of the community. Unfortunately, however, scenes of this kind are too often shown in our supposedly reputable theatres, and similar conduct is described in popular novels that pass muster in respectable homes.

These things may do but little harm to men and women of mature years, and if our 5-cent theatres were patronized as largely by people of that class as are the regular theatres, assassinations, seductions and assignations would be no more objectionable in one than in the other. As a matter of fact, however, the 5-cent theatre, during the earlier hours of the day, is, to a greater extent than the regular places of amusement, the commoner resort for children and is, I believe, at all times more extensively patronized by impressionable people of both sexes from, say, sixteen to twenty-five years of age. On this account, the moral standard should be higher. There seems to be a tendency to display in some cases films that are simply inane, but this may be necessary to meet the requirements of the children from five to fifty years of age and over, who patronize such establishments.

On the whole, so far as the moral and intellectual aspects of the situation are concerned, I can say that while it might be considerably worse than last night's visit disclosed, yet, on the other hand, it might be better.

ALFRED L. SIMPSON IS "DELIGHTED."

Mayor Gaynor's Order to Light Up All Theatres Makes Screen Inventor Happiest Man in New York.

Alfred L. Simpson is bubbling all over with happiness this week, and just had to call up The Film Index office and let everyone there know what good fortune had befallen him.

Of course it all came about because of Mayor Gaynor's letter to the exhibitors of New York City ordering them to light up their theatres while pictures are being run. This means that they must find some way to show pictures in the light. The Simpson Solar Screen is the only device claimed to do this trick, so naturally Mr. Simpson expects his sales to increase in the very near future. As Rhymo, the Monk, would say:

When one's lucky star's in sight,
Who could help but show delight,
Even call up all the papers
And commit some other capers,
To let folks know that pictures
CAN BE LIGHT.

J. B. Douglas, Tecumsch, Neb., proprietor of The Lyric Theatre, shows his enterprise by contributing a column and more to each issue of the weekly paper of his town. "Dug's Lyric Column" is full of interesting chatter about pictures and the kind that is certain to arouse the interest of partitcular people. Douglas says: "This form of advertisement in the smaller country places is very cheap considering the results and has proven very effective in my business."

SOME EDISON FEATURES

More Canadian Subjects—St. Louis Aviation Special

AMONG the forthcoming Edison releases "The Adoption," a western mining story will be found to be a very pleasing subject. The story is of a little lad whose father, a rather brutal specimen of humanity, hands him over for temporary keeping to an Indian family. During the father's absence, the Indians sell him to a kind hearted old miner who takes care of the little "shaver" and becomes quite attached to him. Eventually the father turns up at the Indian's camp and demands his boy, and in the course of events recovers him from the kind hearted old man.

Having had the boy in his care for some time the old fellow has become very much attached to him and finds it very lonesome around the camp without him. He decides to adopt the boy for his own, if the father will consent, and makes a proposition by which the boy is to be transferred to him legally for a very rich claim which he possesses. The father is not particular about the boy and is glad to get the old miner's claim. So the transfer is made and together the boy and his adopted father depart for new scenes, both very happy.

Whether they prosper or not does not appear, but one day the sheriff comes along and acquaints the old fellow with the fact that the true father of the boy has been shot, and that the valuable claim now goes to the boy as his natural heir. This is worked out by the Edison players in a lucid and interesting manner, terminating in a touching little scene in which the old miner is teaching the little fellow his prayers.

SCENE FROM EDISON SUBJECT "THE ADOPTION."

SCENE FROM EDISON SUBJECT "THE SHIP'S HUSBAND."

The Ship's Husband.

It is not generally known that a ship—that is, a merchant ship—has a "husband." The term is not current in every day literature. Around this nautical technicality the Edison players have woven a clever comedy—a sort of maritial mix up based upon the misunderstanding of the term by the wives of two men engaged, presumably, in maritime pursuits.

Jones and Knox are the men in the case and the good ship Charmer, Canadian Pacific coaster running out of Victoria, B. C., is largely the cause of the trouble. Knox is invited by wire to sail with the "Charmer" and advised that it is not necessary to see the "husband." His wife lights on the telegram and suspects all sorts of trouble. Her suspicions are supported by finding a hair on her husband's coat which does not match her own. She immediately starts something. While this is going on Mrs. Jones livewise discovers a misfit hair on her own husband's coat, gets busy. Of course, the thing rights itself in the end, but the situations which develop during the course of the picture are extremely funny.

This is one of the Canadian pictures in which the Canadian Pacific Railroad Company cooperated so generously with the Edison players. In this particular case the steamship "Charmer" was held up at sea for an hour and a half in working out the details. Incidentally the pictures will serve to acquaint the observer with that peculiar and little known term "The Ship's Husband," who is, in fact, the agent in charge while the ship is in port.

The Stolen Claim.

Another number in the series of Edison Canadian pictures soon to be released is "The Stolen Claim," a mining story of British Columbia which serves to introduce some of the wild scenes of the Canadian Rockies. The plot is interesting and quite dramatc in parts. A young doctor has been left the valuable, though undeveloped claim which a friend purloins. This friend also manages to steal the doctor's sweetheart by bribing her father with an interest in the stolen claim. In working the claim a dynamite explosion kills the father and seriously injures the husband. The wife in search of medical aid brings the doctor on the scene. The meeting is unexpected and quite dramatic. The husband, in delirium, jumps over a cliff and is killed, and while the picture does not end in the conventional reconcilliation of the lovers it leaves no doubt in the mind of the observer as to what is the eventual fate of the widow.

In this, there is one very perilous exploit on the part of the injured husband. The cliff from which he jumps in his delirium is a shear drop of 1,500 ft. Apparently he throws himself into the abyss, but at a reasonable distance from the brink a platform was constructed upon which he landed. This part was taken by Mr. Pryor, and though the picture shows that he took the jump without hesitation, there was an element of danger in the exploit that was not pleasing to contemplate. The scene from the cliff at this point showing a mountain torrent like a ribbon of silver in the distance is awe inspiring.

The Edison Manufacturing Company have released a special subject covering the recent St. Louis aviation event, which took place on October 8th to 17th. Among aviation pictures this series is unique and sensational. Several of the bird-men did special stunts for the camera man, some of which are truly wonderful, and, best of all, splendid views of Colonel Roosevelt making the ascent with Hoxsie, were obtained. The reel was released Saturday, October 29.

As an evidence of the business being done at The Pastime Theatre, Barberton, Ohio., Mr. H. L. Hamilton, manager of that house, sends The Index some newspaper clippings of a report of a meetitng of the City Council, at which an ordinance was offered to prevent the manager of the theatre from admitting more persons to his houses than there were seats. The complaint was that the house was crowded to the sidewalk every night. Mr. Hamilton writes that he has installed two Model B Edison machines, and increased his seating capacity materially, but is still unable to handle the crowds that insist on seeing good pictures.

Charles Geyer, proprietor of The Grand, Lexington, Mo., himself an old showman, believes that the picture business should be in the hands of those who understand amusement enterprises. He objects to the "dirty little store room shows," which do not look like theatres and are mismanaged. He believes that all shooting, robbing, fighting, suicides, murders and other immoral incidents should be cut out of pictures; that the house should look up-to-date and so be managed that the better classes would be disposed to attend. Mr. Geyer considers the licensed pictures to be very fine. Mr. Geyer's house, The Grand, at Lexington, is one of the best theatres in that section of the state.

COLONEL ROOSEVELT PREPARING FOR FLIGHT WITH ARCHIE HOXSIE—FROM EDISON SPECIAL AVIATION SUBJECT.

A MOUNTAIN WIFE

A Drama of Life in the Wilds of Tennessee Excellently Portrayed By Melies

OF all the states in this country, Tennessee is the greatest one for moonshiners. In that state whole families live on this nefarious trade and many of them die by it, for United States Revenue officers are ever on their trail. The drama opens with the scene of the mountain home of the moonshiner. We see him bidding his wife an affectionate farewell before starting to his illegal business. The love of these two seems to be intensified because they never knew from one day to the other how long they would be together, so closely was the moonshiner hounded. He went to his cave where we see the distilling apparatus in operation. He is followed there by Revenue officers who hold him at their pistols' end. The game seems to be up with him when a small boy, a friend of this loving couple, makes an odd noise in the woods which causes the Revenue officers to turn, and makes possible the moonshiner's escape. He goes to his mountain home intending to get his wife and flee the country. But the officers arrive and he is forced to hide in a secret place, access to which is had by a trap door.

To save her husband, she lies. She swears that he has not been there, and the officers, after an examination of the house, depart. Everything seems now possible for their escape but they did not reckon on a young artist who in his zeal to have the husband put out of the way remained hidden in the household, and. when the latter reappeared, held him up at the revolver's point. This time the brave wife came to his rescue. She grabbed a pillow which she threw in the artist's face, thus confusing him and giving the husband a chance to obtain the revolver.

The tables were turned now. The artist was forced to board a train, while the husband once more can escape. When the coast is clear, she sends word for her husband to come back to the cabin, help pick up their belongings, to depart from the country and begin life anew.

The picture closes with a beautiful tableau of natural splendor; the escape of the man and his mountain wife to a place where they can work at an honest trade and live a good life, free from offense to God and man.

SCENE FROM MELIES SUBJECT "A MOUNTAIN WIFE."

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Miss Florence E. Turner, "The Vitagraph Girl," who has been taking a much needed rest in the Catskill Mountains, writes that she has been greatly benefited by the mountain air, and will extend her vacation to the Maine woods, where she will enjoy the Autumn scenery and sojourn in a hunting lodge with every possibility of satisfying her taste for outdoor sports and jaunts.

"Drumsticks," the Vitagraph Thanksgiving picture scheduled for November 15th, is full of seasonable thought that will be the very thing for the season and the day. Yes, it has a turkey in it and there is a snowstorm and a sleigh ride. There is a laugh and a cry in it, too, that stirs up the emotions and soothes them at the same time.

Mr. Victor Smith, the cashier of the Vitagraph, has returned from his trip to California where he has been for the past five weeks. He says he had the time of his life and certainly looks it. He was given a hearty welcome at this end and all hands are preparing for a more pronounced manifestation of their good will.

"The Dixie Mother" is considered a master stroke of genius, and the portrayal of emotional depths that gives us an idea of what it meant to be a Southern mother during the Civil War. This kind of a picture will be far reaching in its influence, and a popular one for the South and of especial interest to the whole country. We advance these opinions to bring this release before the trade that they will not miss this wonderful "Life Portrayal."

"Adventures of a Hat," Tuesday, November 8th, is a comedy of funny situations all through a wife's generosity in loaning her best hat to a friend who is mistaken for the wife by her husband. "The Nine of Diamonds" will be the trump on Friday, November 11th, and it is the winning card that will take the hearts of the audiences and show how bread cast upon the waters returns to us after many days. "Jean Goes Fishing" on Saturday, November 12th. It's a great catch and one of those dog pictures that convinces us that a faithful friend is always of service when we least expect it and most need it.

HALLBERG Photoplay, No. 2

"The Proof of the Pudding"

CHARACTERS:
Proprietor of Savoy Theatre. Operator at Savoy Theatre
Scene: Savoy Theatre, Brooklyn, N. Y.

(Explanatory: Contrary to the wishes of his manager, and only because he could save a few dollars on first cost of installation, the proprietor did not buy a "Hallberg" Economizer. Read the consequences.)

(Enter Proprietor during performance.)

Proprietor—"What in the world is the matter with the light on that picture?"

Operator—"I cannot help it; we cannot do any better with the Inductor you bought."

Proprietor—"Well, if that is the best the Inductor will do I certainly am not satisfied with it. See what you can do to improve on that exhibition."

(Two days later, the proprietor again comes to the theatre.)

Proprietor—"Well, I see you have a fine light now. What did you do to get this improvement?"

Operator—"I had an old Hallberg Economizer which had been in use at the Beach, and installed it in place of the Inductor so you could see what a vast difference it makes in the quality of light."

Proprietor—"The Hallberg certainly does all that is claimed for it, and there is no doubt in my mind about what machine we will use."

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.

Scott & Van Altena.

"I WILL MISS YOU GIRLIE MINE."—Words by Jack Allman; music by Geo. N. Finkelstone; published by F. B. Haviland, New York. The set is of the well-known love ballad kind with the excellent coloring and novelties of Scott & Van Altena.

"TELL ME ONCE AGAIN YOU LOVE ME."—Lyric by Charles Horwitz; music by Frederick V. Bowers; published by Chas. K. Harris, New York. Now being sung with great success by F. V. Bowers, the author. The slides show clearly again the natural grace and charm Scott & Van Altena's models seem to have. It does one good to see perfect charm and composure portrayed by other folks.

"SOME OF THESE DAYS."—Words and music by Shelton Brooks; published by Will Rossiter, Chicago. Mr. Brooks is the composer of "Yon Ain't Talking To Me," etc., and is well known among music folk. Slides for this set are of the descriptive order and tell the story clearly in pictures.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"ONLY ONE DAISY LEFT."—Waltz song and refrain, by Anita Owen; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co. A song of the reminiscent order, written in Miss Owen's best vein. The slides show a maid who treasures a daisy she has kept in memory of her childish sweetheart. The set is photographically perfect and the posing is beyond criticism. Although this is not an easy song to pose. The daisy flower is well featured and the whole set is a good one.

"OH THAT BOOG-A-BOO MAN."—Words and music by Dave Kaplan and Joe Samuels; published by the Billy Walson Music Pub. Co., Empire Theatre Bldg., Brooklyn, N. Y. A clever set of lyrics, telling the children they must be good or the Boog-a-boo man will get them, set to a melody well in keeping with the lyrics. The slides are beyond criticism, posed by an exceedingly clever child actress, and the Boog-a-boo man's make up is "boogie" enough for any one. A set that reflects great credit on Wheeler's enterprise. Photographic perfection abounds throughout the set and it is bound to please.

"ANY PLACE IS HEAVEN WHEN YOU'RE WITH THE GIRL YOU LOVE."—Words and music by Anita Owen; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co. This writer always produces a good song and she has not failed in this instance. Both lyrics and melody are beyond criticism.. The slides are of the usual high grade produced by Wheeler and illustrate the song perfectly. More than the usual number of features are present and the set is a good one.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"THAT'S THE FELLOW I WANT TO GET."—Words by Alfred Bryan; music by Geo. W. Meyer, the world-famous makers of hits. Another great hit song released by the celebrated House of Haviland. This is another "Kelly." The story is of a mischievous kid, who catches Ma kissing the ice-man. He wants to get even so he goes to the druggist and begs for whooping cought germs. He gets the whooping cough and passes it along to an endless string of people, till at last the iceman gets it and that's the fellow he wants to get. The pictures are all made from life by Simpson and his celebrated company of character models and he has spared no pains or expense to have them original, exceedingly funny and remarkably artistic.

"MOTHER, DEAREST SWEETHEART."—Words and music by Wm. T. Vayo; published by Wm. Vayo Music Co., Boston, Mass. A beautiful melody and a dainty little story of the love of a boy for his mother. The sweet-faced mother is shown from youth to age in a series of beautiful pictures, such as Simpson knows so well how to make.

Levi Company, Inc.

"I'M LOOKING FOR A DEAR OLD LADY."—Lyrics by Edgar Selden; music by Tom Kelly; published by Shapiro. The story tells about a little girl who wanders down to the big Metropolitan Depot hunting for her grandmother. The carefully selected models are well adapted for the parts they play and the result has been a beautiful set of slides. The title of this song is being extensively advertised throughout the country and there is no doubt but what the song will prove a big hit.

"WHEN THE BLOOM IS ON THE CLOVER, MOLLY DEAR."—Words by Roy E. Miller; music by Bert Sams; published by Roy. E. Miller, Spokane, Wash. This is one of the old ballads that has never been illustrated and as the song is well known there will probably be a big demand for the slides. The models are very good looking and the scenery beautiful.

CONCERNING HALLBERG'S ECONOMIZER.

Mr. J. H. Hallberg tells us that a particularly gratifying feature of the many new installations of the Hallberg Economizer, recently made by him, is the fact that it is replacing many other makes of current savers. Mr. Hallberg is the pioneer manufacturer of current saving devices for moving picture theatres and spent a large amount of money and time in advertising and educating exhibitors in the value of current savers. The Economizer being more expensive than other makes, many exhibitors first purchased the cheaper; but Hallberg says that when they learn by experience, he is called upon to set them right.

Here are a few who have recently come to recognize the merits of the Economizer, even though it is a little higher in price:

Louis Matule, Peoples' Theatre, Carbondale; Hansen & Hansen, Bijou Theatre, Deer Lodge, Mont.; R. G. Perry, "The Grand," Waverly, N. Y.; A. Weinstein, Passaic, N. J.; J. S. Thomas, Kingston, Pa.; S. DeMayo, 308 West 143d street, New York.

The fame of the Hallberg Economizer extends all over the civilized world, wherever moving picture shows are operated, as is evidenced by the fact that orders are being filled for Japan, the Phillipine Islands and South America. Mr. Hallberg also reports many recent sales of his low voltage Tungsten Lamp Transformers for sign lighting.

AN IMPORTANT IMPROVEMENT.

It seems that in the patented double cone shutter, which operates on the inside of the mechanism, the manufacturers of the Motiograph have scored a big hit. The shutter having two separate wings operating in opposite directions and in a direction almost vertical to the aperture plate, the opening and closing movements of the shutter is made so quickly that a considerable amount of illumination is saved that would otherwise be lost. Besides the shutter is entirely protected from harm by being on the inside of the mechanism.

GET YOUR MONEY'S WORTH

Why stick to the old fashioned Carbon that is fairly "eaten up" by the current when you can get the long burning BIO for very little more money?

The BIO lasts about a third longer than the old fashioned kind. If you are paying more than three-fourths of the BIO price, for any other carbon, you are throwing money away.

We do not take advantage of the fact that we have no competition to exact an unreasonable price. BIO Carbons are sold, not for as much as they are worth but at a fair profit. We are glad to give you a better carbon and save you money at the same time.

Besides the long-burning feature, BIO Carbons will give you a clearer, steadier, whiter light, than you ever saw before.

If you haven't proved this for yourself, pin your check for $1.50 to this ad, and mail it to our nearest office for a sample 50 5/8 x 6 prepaid.

LEADING AMERICAN EXPONENT OF THE PHOTOPLAY

AN OFFICIAL VIEW OF PICTURE PROBLEMS

By Francis V. S. Oliver, Jr., Chief of Bureau of Licenses, New York City

YOU have asked me to unreel a film from the moving picture show of my mind, the one upon which are imprinted impressions and opinions of the business of moving picture shows in New York City. Two years' work in supervising and licensing the New York shows has put such a film in my exchange. I will censor and clip it, and show briefly only those parts pertinent to the discussions which interest the public.

The public is interested in the physical character of the show houses and the kind of pictures shown.

On account of the perfection at the start of the moving picture camera and machines, the development of the business depended almost wholly upon the rapidity of the manufacturers in producing pictures, and the industry of the exhibitors in procuring places in which to show them. The public was a ready and willing captive.

In the hurry to provide theatres, there were drafted into service tenement houses, stables, old fire houses, stores, private dwellings and other structures, equally unsuited for the accommodation of the crowds that attended. Unsafe exits were provided, exit doors were nailed up, seats were not fastened to the floors, inflammable films were left exposed near the people.

When the authorities took these matters up and served notice that the laws must be obeyed, the results were highly satisfactory. Owners voluntarily adopted the rule of installing as many safeguards as the character of their buildings would permit. They should consider now the proposition of devising an economical ventilator so as to keep the air sweet and healthful. Furthermore, every house should be lighted up while the pictures are being shown. This must be done all over the country.

It is not right that public places, where so many young people assemble and are in the company of strangers, should be dark. The addition of colored lights makes the hall beautiful; relieves the eye tension, due to the sharp contrast between utter darkness and the brilliant glare of the picture; guides the people in and out, gives the manager a chance to see his patrons, and keeps from blackguards a chance to hurt the good will of the picture show business, which chance heretofore the darkness guaranteed to them.

The prospective owner to-day usually searches for a vacant lot upon which to build an independent structure. This is the ideal way to build. Many of the present show houses have been constructed on this plan and are a splendid tribute to their owners. Inside and outside they are attractive; the greatest skill and care has been exerted to make them comfortable, safe and pleasing to the eye. It can be concluded that the moving picture show houses in New York have reached a high standard and that among them can be found many that can be exhibited as models for the whole country.

The public seems to have greater interest in the character of the pictures than in the character of the show houses. This brings us up to the question of censorship. In view of the fact that there is a censorship under volunteer auspices of the pictures produced by several companies, and it is freely admitted by the companies that this censorship is of great benefit to them, and since it is, in my judgment, a fact that this censorship has caused the production of a more satisfactory class of pictures, it would seem that an official censorship, clothed with power to enforce its decisions, and which would be neutral to all interests, would be the ideal form of censorship.

Such a censorship should be conducted by Civil Service Employees who would soon become expert in their work; who would know the history of the films, the laws and proprieties of the business, and who could devise a set of rules that would serve a fair notice upon the producers to protect them from incurring heavy expenses, only to be informed that their pictures were condemned for some reason that they were not aware of when making them.

The doctrine that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure is very pertinent here. It is very difficult and improvident, after an objectionable picture has been produced, and hundreds of films depicting it are sent out broadcast, to punish for each display. If the picture is condemned before it is published, the task is simple and the least possible loss is incurred by its owner.

Otherwise, I am in favor of the continuation of the present censorship and think that the moral agreement that binds all to observe its verdicts will be of greater public benefit than an unscientific attack upon the business by persons who would take the work as an undesirable and uninteresting addition to their present official tasks.

The pictures cannot, on account of the presence of so many children, be in accord with the spirit of the novels and the plays which are accepted and praised by the public. Scenes of crime and depravity on the stage, which are witnessed by the most respectable people in the land, seem to be too violent and harmful in their effects upon the minds of the young to be permitted in picture show houses. It is a fact, in my judgment, that the pictures shown are fifty per cent. cleaner morally than are the novels and plays of this day and of the days in which our forefathers lived. It is equally certain in my opinion that the level of this morality will never fall as low as has fallen the moral level of some of the so-called plays on our present stage. But let us insure this by an official or unofficial censorship. Brutus must not murder Caesar in the presence of our children; Raffles must be seen only by our elders; scenes of murder and moral baseness must not be put before the young. Good! In the meantime the older people are getting the benefit of and are enjoying exhibitions pure enough for the eyes of a child. There are real tears and cheers and laughter in picture show houses. If you doubt it come with me on an inspection some day.

CASUAL COMMENT

MUTTERINGS and grumblings in the vicinity of Cleveland, Ohio, last week were not caused by meteoric disturbances or siesmic tremors. There was a meeting of the emancipated film exchange men in that city to protest against the newest tyranny in the film business, the Laemmle-Kessel Sales Company, which is alleged to have broken faith with the "independent" exchanges and which has attempted to exercise its monopolistic tendencies by excluding certain film makers from the privilege of selling pictures to the aforesaid exchanges. It is singular that these scandalous proceedings should be alleged against Laemmle's little trust, or that the philanthropic Laemmle should permit the creature of his brain to oppress the weak and to persecute the fair goddess of "independence." The "alliance," as the "independents" call their organization, adopted several resolutions and put the matter up to the Sales Company, which is supposed to take the several recommendations under consideration.

In the meantime the Sales Company will continue to ship film C. O. D. to secure itself and the "independent" manufacturers against loss which might occur under more liberal arrangements. And as for letting more manufacturers in on the Sales Company selling arrangement, is not the "independent" market becoming rather crowded?

It should be remembered that Laemmle & Kessel framed up that Sales Company deal to provide a market for their own product; they control it, so their desire to keep others out is perfectly natural and a reasonable business proposition. Why should the exchange men persist in spoiling the little plan?

MENTION of Kessel reminds us that that distinguished financier has just settled some of his obligations to the licensed manufacturers, incurred when he was buying licensed pictures. When the old Empire exchange ceased to be a licensed rental bureau, Kessel owed various amounts to the manufacturers which ordinary methods of collection failed to extract from him. Suit was brought in behalf of the Kalem Company and Pathe Freres and judgment obtained. Before this could be collected supplementary proceedings had to be commenced. The prospect of telling the history of his life did not appeal to Mr. Kessel, so he settled with his judgment creditors, the other day in full.

THOSE who think the manufacturers of pictures always have an easy time should have been on the job in New York during the past week or so, trying to make deliveries of pictures to various parts of the country. With all express companies serving New York City tied in a knot by the strike of express drivers, the matter of shipping film from the metropolis assumed a serious aspect. Special messengers with trunks filled with film were sent hither and thither seeking an open office, and many of them had to go as far as Philadelphia to find one. The question of getting film into New York was just as difficult. This hit the exchange men hardest, for they were unable to get back the films they had previously shipped.

Word reaches us from Chicago that Selig sent his releases to New York by special messenger on the 20th Century Express to insure delivery; it is probable that the other Chicago manufacturers were compelled to resort to similar measures to get their pictures to New York.

Negotiations are now pending for a settlement of the strike and the situation will probably be cleared up within the coming week.

NEWSPAPER reports from San Francisco relate that a photographer named B. L. Duhem has been arrested for duping the Johnson-Jeffries fight pictures; that he has confessed to having stolen the film from the Valentia theatre and implicated others in a deep-laid plan to sell the duped film in foreign countries. As a result of Duhem's confession Benjamin Michaels, manager of the Silver theatre, has been arrested as an accomplice. Tex Rickard and the attorneys of the J. & J. Company are after the dupers and will probably land them in a secure domicile.

DOUGHERTY-BUTT

Miss Mayme Elinore Butt, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Butt, and Mr. Leo E. Dougherty were married at the home of the bride on Wednesday, Oct. 26. Mr. Dougherty has been connected with the Biograph Company for several years and is well known to the picture profession. Mr. Butt, father of the bride, has been manager of Keith's Union Square Theatre for some time. The bride and groom were guests of a theatre party in the evening and enjoyed a memorable taxicab ride and after theatre supper at Faust's, where they were greeted with an ovation by the orchestra and a number of friends and acquaintances who happened to be present. The Film Index extends its heartiest congratulations and wishes the newlyweds much happiness.

WASHINGTON TIMES INVESTIGATION

Report of Chas. F. Nesbit, of Y. M. C. A. and A. T. Stuart, Supt. of Public Schools

By C. F. NESBIT.

The Washington Times headed its symposium on the motion picture shows of the city with the question, "Are motion picture shows hurtful to the morals of the children?"

The examination made is so limited that I must speak from an inadequate study, but what I have seen in representative shows in widely scattered sections of the city would lead me to say no to that question.

The pictures I have seen were mostly instructive or entertaining; the grotesque with a humorous intent, as well as the dramatic representations were appeals that seemed to have no moral influence one way or the other.

The only questionable picture I saw was one which, by emphasizing the ridiculous, or funny side of intoxication, might give young people a false view of the bad results of alcoholic poisoning.

The matter of defective ventilation is one our Health Department must already be clothed with power to regulate.

The effect of the peculiar lights and the motions on the eyesight of growing children, if frequently indulged in by them, is one for the physician and oculist.

The larger question arises as to the part played by the motion picture show on the social life of the modern city. On the whole it seems to me a decided advance and advantage.

Here we find scattered near the homes places of amusement, the admission price being only the price of a single car fare. They are interesting, entertaining, and instructive. You see distant lands and scenes, the great sights and cities of the world. You see the dramatic and amusing with almost the vividness of the reality.

They appeal to the family unit, especially of the poorer people and the present high cost of living is putting us all rapidly with that class) in a very compelling way. The average man can here get with his entire family, even if he be blessed with several children, an evening's entertainment for what he would not consider an unreasonable expenditure in a saloon. He is certainly better physically and morally. The entire family have been together. They have subjects for much family talk and discussion. Their horizon of life has been broadened. Their cares and worries have been successfully replaced with new and pleasant impressions.

The problem of censorship or a wise selection of subjects to be presented does not seem difficult, and the educational values of the motion picture show, when wisely directed, are truly vast and inspiring.

Aside from the question of health already touched upon, it seems to me there should be no official or legal machinery. But there should be a strong moral influence exerted through the 5-cent theatre, as well as all the other social recreative agencies of city life. The use of anyone's leisure time is very largely the determining factor in the formation of character.

The motion picture shows are only a part of the vast and complex social machinery of the modern city which must be animated by a great moral and religious purpose if civilization is to progress. The stage, playgrounds, dancing, and all the recreative life of a city should be considered carefully, and be wisely directed by some body of citizens, but through the power of moral influence and with an intelligent comprehension of the larger life.

Personally I fear a too great trust in law or legal restraints ,and I also fear any attempted organization to deal alone with any one feature, such as the 5-cent theatre. The danger is in constructing too large a mill for the amount of grist; of getting our problems tangled in a multitude of organizations.

The Times question holds the suggestion, but let them ask not only of the motion picture shows but of all the social life of the city:

"Are these hurtful to the morals of our people?" and then "How can we help make them helpful to our city's morals?"

The moral forces of Washington must find some way of organizing and co-operating to make Washington not only the City Beautiful, as it is now so far as streets, parks, and buildings go, but in the sense of the poet, also the greatest city.

But let this organization not only influence the motion pictures, let it influence all social life and give it all the objective of sanity and health.

By A. T. STUART.

My experience with motion picture shows is rather limited, so I am not competent to pass with authority upon the merits of the pictures commonly displayed in these shows. Those which I happened to see may have been the best, probably they were not the worst. I have seen enough of them, however, to warrant me in forming an opinion.

So far as outright immorality in the motion picture shows goes, I think there is little to fear. They are easily controlled in this respect, and cannot be as demoralizing as cheap theatres, where vice not only flaunts before the eye, but shocks the ear. Police supervision of the films in any town where a right moral sentiment prevails, will serve, as it probably has served in Washington, to keep these exhibitions free from anything that would offend the moral sense.

I would rather risk my child in the motion picture show than have him habitually see and hear many numbers on the vaudeville stage. An efficient police supervision of the character of the pictures will easily keep out those that are positively bad, but police censorship stops at this point. It can do nothing to protect our youth from exhibitions which, while not plainly labeled as immoral, cruelly outrage all the standards held by people of good taste and refined sensibility. Here an educated public sentiment alone can effect a reform.

Clearly the most harmful of the pictures shown in Washington are those which partake of the character of what Charles Dickens called "a good, murderous melodrama." These may be found in any of the cheap theatres and seem to be the best card of the five-cent show. Some, not all of them, pointedly suggest wrongdoing—such as clever deceit, theft, drunkenness, and finally seduction and murder; but those who put on this class of plays and pictures defend them as positive agencies for doing good, and refer proudly to the wholesome moral at the end, the opportune rescue of the betrayed or the swift doom of the evildoer. But this, as we all know, was the fallacious defense of the old yellow-back novel of odious memory, and the five-cent melodrama is too often the old dime novel brought to life again, but clothed in so brilliant a disguise as to be more perilous to good taste and good morals than its discredited prototype ever was.

Audiences were exceptionally quiet and two-thirds of the people in them were adults. Ruffians do not seem to resort to these places. The character of the entertainment does not appear to invite fellows who want noise, but the meeting of very young people of opposite sexes in great numbers, seemingly without chaperonage or restraint and at late hours, constitutes a menace to which parents of girls seem astonishingly oblivious.

Mothers with babes in arms were not infrequently present and this fact seems to guarantee the customary orderliness of these resorts. The films were of three general types—those designed to instruct, those intended purely to amuse and the dramatic story with a suitably thrilling climax. The majority are of the last named class. Educational subjects were seldom used. Some of the series of pictures were without point, and others simply silly, but it must be said that most of them apart from their offenses against good taste, as shown in their subjects were artistically beautiful.

I recall at least one sweet scene which portrayed childhood in its happiest moods, innocent and free. This one could be characterized as not only beyond criticism. but really invested with an uncommon charm. It lingers pleasantly in my memory. Not so that other one, which painted gratuitously the swift descent to dishonor of a beautiful girl, and the buried hopes of father and brother. That was brutal, demoralizing and serving no good purpose. The story were better untold.

The grown-up people who attend these shows are sincere, thoughtful, quiet and well dressed, and no doubt find much to divert them after the day's work. The real artistic beauty and fascination of the motion pictures would make them an especially effective instrumentality in the education of the young, and I hope the time is not distant when they can be made available for such high purposes. The field is unlimited.

I am told that men are drawn away from the saloons by the attractions of the five-cent theatres.

If this be so it covers a multitude of sins.

A TIP TO THE MANUFACTURERS

Editor THE FILM INDEX:

Dear Sir: I have read with much interest the various views of managers as to the best methods of drawing patronage into the theatres. I have tried various methods; I use hand bills galore, have had an outline of the film printed and passed out to the audience as they come in, but the very best method that I have yet found is to cut from the FILM INDEX the pictures and synopsis of the film and paste on a cardboard with appropriate wording. I no sooner do this than the crowd begins to gather, reads it and discusses it, and it is a fact that almost nine out of every ten will pass their approval of the picture just as soon as they finish reading it and it is surprising how many after coming out of the theatre will stop to read it again and to correct one another as to their opinions gathered while looking at the picture.

I believe if every manufacturer would send to each exhibitor a small sheet, say 9x10 or 10x12, giving the story of the film with as many cuts as possible that they would answer two purposes—first, to advise the local manager of the date of release and also for the manager to display in front of his theatre to advise the public what they are going to see. I use all the A. B. C. posters, painted banners, etc., but find nothing like the story of the pictures with a few good cuts to draw the crowd in. These will not cost the manufacturers as much as the elaborate booklets they are now getting out and which one half are useless on account of printing on both sides of the paper. Now, Brother Manager, just try this scheme and see if you have the same results as myself and if so write the manufacturers on the above line. I am sure they are wide-awake to any new wrinkle to help pull the money in the box office. Very truly yours,

ELSON HOMMEL,
Mgr. Arcade Theatre, Brownsville, Pa.

WICHITA'S NEW PHOTOPLAY THEATRE.

The Colonial a Beautiful Palace of Entertainment —Prettiest and Coziest Theatre in Kansas.

Since the opening night—August 15th—no theatre in Kansas has attracted more attention than the new Colonial photoplay theatre, Wichita. For the past four months this popular house has been the attraction of thousands of theatre goers, who know and love the best in the amusement line; not even the legitimate house, with its star productions, has been able to decrease the attendance at the Colonial, and every night large crowds can be seen lined in front of the box office, waiting to get in.

The Colonial photoplay theatre was built by the Snodgrass-Mackey Amusement Co., of Denver, and is one of the finest and best equipped houses built by that well known concern. It is modern in every way—having all the up-to-date safety devices used by picture theatres. The electric work in the Colonial is said to be the best of any of the company's houses—electricity being used for everything in the way of lighting, cleaning and ventilating. There are over 3,000 Tungsten lights in and about the building; 1,300 being used for lighting the front of the house, and the big electric sign, which is the finest and most brilliant along North Market street.

Perhaps the lighting plan of the Colonial will be interesting to many managers, who intend building photoplay theatres. None of the lights used in the interior of the house are of the brilliant kind that cause the eyes to pain after looking at the pictures. All the lights are toned down by subdued pheno shades, similar to the famous opal glass. Besides, the lights are so arranged that the light obtained is diffused, and at no time, while the picture is being shown on the screen, is the house so dark that a person can't recognize his friend or neighbor on the other side of the house.

The carpets, draperies and rugs cost more than $2,000 and the opera chairs, of a beautiful olive green, are low backed, specially designed, have a unique adornment and are not known to any other house in Wichita. The beautiful moldings and friezes are of old ivory with flowers and vines in natural colors and shades. The figures, such as musical instruments, birds and flowers, are all of raised work in tintings to enliven the pure white of the background across the face of the gallery. On a delicate moss green background are draperies in red and green and the entire color scheme is rich, glowing and refreshing.

The house cost over $15,000 and seats 900 persons.

HARRY DANTO IN TOWN.

Harry Danto, recording secretary and treasurer of the Motion Picture Protective Union, Local 182, I. A. T. S. E., of Boston, Mass., was a visitor at The Film Index Wednesday, Nov. 3.

Mr. Danto reports that the motion picture game in Boston could not be better and that all the houses are doing an excellent business. He also claims that the harmony that exists between the managers and operators is most gratifying and all the houses are getting good and capable operators.

There are now 125 men in the Boston Union.

CELEBRATED ANNIVERSARY.

The Swaab Palace, Gloucester, N. J., celebrated its first anniversary on Monday, Oct. 10. It was a big night with a special program and an extra attraction, "The Village Comedy Four," which made a big hit. The seating capacity of the Palace is 500. Over 700 admissions were sold for the first show, which opened at 6:45 p. m., and fifteen minutes later there was a crowd of 500 more awaiting admission.

One of the features of the evening's program was a picture of Miss Florence E. Turner, the Vitagraph Girl, who is a big favorite at Gloucester. Mr. John Hayes is manager of the Swaab Palace.

NEW ASSISTANT MANAGER AT LINCOLN SQ.

L. Geisenberg, the head usher at the Lincoln Square theatre, New York city, who has been acting as assistant manager since Mr. Joseph Bradt returned to San Francisco, was this week appointed by Maurice Loew, the owner of the house, to fill the vacancy. Mr. Geisenberg needs no introduction to the Lincoln Square audiences, for during the year he has been the head usher he has made the acquaintance of all the regular patrons.

The Lincoln Square is one of the best photoplay theatres in New York city and caters to one of the most refined audiences. Mr. Geisenberg should prove an able assistant to Mr. Ferguson, the popular manager of the house.

Lubin's "Right in Front of Father" Presents an Interesting Scene in a Rattling Little Comedy

MANY exhibitors will remember the very real sensation that was created by the barber shop scene in "The Stronger Sex" when the little heroine as a part of her metamorphosis into a comely youth went to a barber shop and ordered a man's haircut.

Much the same effect is employed in the Lubin comedy, "Right in Front of Father," scheduled for release November 17. In the story the daughter of a deacon loves the son of the other deacon of the village church. Of course it is not right for a deacon to be jealous of his confrere but this deacon suffers slight pangs of envy and he extends his dislike to the son so when he finds that the young man wants to marry his daughter he tells her that unless his approval of her match is indicated by his presence at the wedding he will cut her off without a penny.

To clinch matters he writes the other deacon to this effect, warning the son that if he gets the girl he won't get the money. Jack's father naturally grows hot at what he considers a slight and he tells his son with emphasis that this warning goes double for him.

Cupid is dissolved in tears and it begins to look as though the course of true love had been twisted into a roller coaster track but the quick witted girl is not to be denied and proves again that love will always find a way.

She learns that there is to be a conference at the parsonage that evening and she sends word to Jack to come over to the house and bring his best suit with him. That seems an odd sort of request but Jack knows enough to do what he is told and he soon puts in an appearance. Daisy clips her hair to a mannish cut and saves the silky locks to improvise a wig. Jack shaves his precious moustache and Daisy glues that to her upper lip. Then an exchange of clothing is effected and presently the pair set out for the rectory.

SCENE FROM LUBIN SUBJECT "RIGHT IN FRONT OF FATHER."

The kindly minister is always ready to act at a wedding, but he needs witnesses and surely there could be none better than his two deacons. They are called in from the library and the ceremony is begun.

Daisy is a little nervous until objectors are warned to speak or ever after hold their peace but there is no objection from the smiling deacons and the ceremony is concluded.

Then comes the unmasking and the two deacons are dumbfounded. They storm about and declare that they will not recognize the rebellious children who have defied them to their very faces but Daisy points out that according to the decree their presence was to mark their approval and as she has been married right in front of father his consent should be taken for granted.

The haircut is merely an incidental to a lively little farce in which the action moves rapidly to a surprise climax and it promises to be one of the most notable of the recent Lubin productions.

PICTURE THEATRES IN RUSSIA.

The picture theatres in St. Peterburg and Moscow are not doing as big business as those in the South of Russia, because they do not offer the people enough comfort, and so open air amusements prove the greater attraction. Our correspondent passed through Keiff at a time of tropical heat, and was astonished to see all the theatres crowded, and in some better class shows people waiting outside for vacant seats with tickets in their hands. The prices charged are more or less the same all over Russia. There are seats for 50 kopecks up to 2 roubles 50 kopecks. "Penny shows" charge 10 kopecs up to 75 kopecs. Kieff is the only town in South Russia where "Cabaret" pictures are still shown, and these theatres, which are mostly named "Theatre de Paris" or "Gay Paris," etc., are marked by a dirty front and very little illumination. These shows are doing just as well as the others, and are crowded up to 12 o'clock at night. The price charged is 50 kopecks, and in combination with the "cabaret" pictures they show Pathe films at least three or four years old. The "Electric Theatres" in the principal towns passed never hold more than 400 or 500 people, the only exception being a new theatre in Rostoff, on the Don. The auditorium holds about 1,000, and the foyer is like those in most leading theatres in Russia—a place of great comfort, and visitors enjoy besides refreshments high-class music in the intervals.

In the South of Russia all the better class theatres are doing splendid business. If some of your English picture theatre companies, with the help of a branch of an English renting house, would establish themselves over here, offering the audience the same as they do in London, they would do even better than the existing shows. The Russian is quite an amateur in motion pictures, and in many big towns the "electric theatre" is the only decent enjoyment. —The Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly.

A CORRECTION.

In mentioning the new theatre being built in Mexico, Mo., The Film Index made a mistake as to the name of the manager. The house is being constructed by Mr. S. C. Thompson, who will manage the same when completed.

FIGHT PICTURES AT OSHKOSH.

Grey & Houze, proprietors of the Lyric Theatre, Oshkosh, Wis., report that the Johnson-Jeffries Fight Pictures made a big hit in that town, receiving numerous flattering criticisms from the local papers.

"The Lad From Old Ireland"

Kalem Company's First Irish-American Picture

MENTION has already been made in these columns of the enterprise of the Kalem Company in sending a company of its players abroad in search of interesting pictures. The first subject to be produced as a result of this trip is entitled "The Lad From Old Ireland." The story begins with the young Irishman at work in the peat bogs; he becomes dissatisfied with his lot and determines to go to America. There is a parting scene about the old cottage that is a typical old Ireland.

SCENE AT IRISH COTTAGE NEAR CORK.

We next see the boy aboard the steamship for America. Then he is seen wheeling brick on a New York skyscraper. Ten years later he is shown as a successful candidate for Alderman. Back in old Ireland, in the meanwhile, things are not so rosy. His sweetheart is in the clutches of extreme poverty. Her mother dies and the landlord comes to evict her from the old home. Friends have written to the lad in America of the distress at home and he returns in time to stop the eviction and presumably to bring his sweetheart to America to share his good fortune.

The characteristic points of the picture are the depiction of the scenes among peasantry in the vicinity of Cork. The view of scenes of the peat bog, of the farmers harvesting grain and of the old thatched cottage will appeal to the thousands of Irish men and women who have found prosperity and happiness in America.

The extreme novelty of a picture taken by an American company in Ireland is certain to appeal to the picture enthusiasts, and the appeal is strengthened by embracing both worlds—the old and the new—in the same story. There is no mistaking the scenes in Ireland, and every son and daughter of the "old sod" will recognize them. In some instances it will be real pictures of home, for among those who assisted the Kalem players many have relatives in America.

As an investment it is not likely that the Kalem company will find their venture very profitable, but as an advertisement it has certainly hit upon a plan that will bring more publicity than could be obtained from a like expenditure of money in any other direction.

THE ROSES OF THE VIRGIN.

AN interesting comedy drama of the Canadian woods is depicted by the Kalem players in the forthcoming subject entitled "Roses of the Virgin." Through a secret marriage a young scapegrace has got in bad with his father and is banished to a lumber camp to make good. "Good" seems not to be in him for he immediately commences flirtation with the daughter of the boss of the lumberjacks, with whom one of the woodsmen stranger from the city and previously ordered the young woodsman to keep away. The old man happens along at the critical moment and hears the denunciation of the false lover, whereupon there is a reconciliation and the three repair to the shrine where the roses are again laid amid a scene of reverent thanksgiving. There is a religious touch to this subject that is very effective.

CHEAP VAUDEVILLE NO GO IN UTAH.

Even in sparsely settled Utah comes the cry of photoplay managers to eliminate cheap vaudeville from the photoplay houses. One would think in a state where the cowboys still exist, there would be the Mecca for that kind of entertainment. But, alas! Even the cow punchers had to turn their eyes in shame, and now they frankly admit that pictures, good music and good singing beats all the cheap vaudeville that ever trod the boards.

Managers N. J. Brewer and Frank R. Powell of the Osos Grand photoplay theatre, Canon City, Utah, in a letter to The Film Index, writes: "Business in Canon City is excellent, and pictures are taking well with the patrons. Besides showing three full reels, we have two illustrated song singers and a large, first class orchestra."

Both managers claim the vaudeville at photoplay theatre prices don't take in Utah for a "cent." Every one in that section of the country wants to see what is good, and good pictures and cheap vaudeville mar any kind of a performance.

NEW HOUSE FOR DU BOIS, PA.

John McHenry, who has been engaged as an illustrated song singer at the Star photoplay theatre, Du Bois, Pa., resigned his position last week and will now go in the business for himself. He has secured a lease on the Opera House, for a term of years, and after a thorough overhauling of that place, will put in licensed pictures and first class vaudeville. Mr. McHenry is well known in Du Bois and his new venture will be looked forward to with much interest by the citizens of that city. The town has a large theatre-going population and it is expected he will do a good business.

The new photoplay theatre which recently opened in Greencastle, Pa., is doing a good business. The house is located on the main street and the most popular amusement place in the town.

A photoplay theatre is to occupy the north room of the Hale Block, Cuyahoga Falls, O.

The Empire Amusement Co. opened a new photoplay theatre, Oct. 15, on First street, Great Falls, Mont. Lester Webber of Great Falls will sing the illustrated songs.

EDISON THANKSGIVING SUBJECT

Mother's Thanksgiving a Fine Comedy. Other Subjects.

AMONG the coming Edison subjects "Mother's Thanksgiving," a seasonable release, will touch a sympathetic chord. Mother is a good old-fashioned country woman whose son is just about to depart for the city where he expects to make his fortune. There is a very touching parting and the mother is left alone at the old home with her memories and a fond hope for her son's future.

For several years the young man toils and progresses in the city. He has promised his mother that he would return home for Thanksgiving, but at the last moment an important engagement compels him to cancel his visit and remain in the city. The good old mother is deeply disapponted, but decides that she will not be cheated out of her Thanksgiving with her son, and sets out for the city to join him there, keeping her intentions a secret from him.

The picture takes us to the city where the young man is preparing for a Thanksgiving dinner to his friends, including his fiancee. This is the engagement which has kept him from visiting his mother.

The old lady appears on the scene just as the guests are assembling and the son was called from his friends to meet his mother in the entry. Life in the city has swelled the young man up considerably, and the appearance of his mother in her homely attire doesn't meet his approval, so he hurries her upstairs to keep her out of the way of his more fashionable guests, intending that she shall eat her dinner alone in the chamber while he is entertaining his friends below. Having disposed of his mother the young man returns to his guests.

The last of the party to arrive is the young man's fiancee and her father. The girl is ushered upstairs by the servant and gets into the room where the old mother is just preparing to leave the house. She has written a note to her son and attached it to his favorite brand of pumpkin pie, which she has brought all the way from home, when the young woman enters. A few words explain the situation to the girl and she proceeds to sit down to eat Thanksgiving dinner with the old lady, determining to ignore the gay party downstairs. Her continued absence starts the young man in search of her, and he finds her with his mother apparently enjoying herself. The situation is rather embarrassing for the young man, but after due apologies, the old lady is taken down to the dining room, introduced to the guests and becomes one of the little circle of merry makers.

The picture is of delightful home comedy and a very timely subject.

SCENE FROM "MOTHER'S THANKSGIVING."

SCENE FROM "THE TOYMAKER, THE DOLL AND THE DEVIL."

THE TOYMAKER, THE DOLL AND THE DEVIL.

Under this title the Edison players have produced a thoroughly interesting and amusing comedy. The old toymaker has become possessed with the idea that he can endow his manikins with life. He has spent a great deal of time upon the reproduction of a very beautiful dancing girl in which he endeavors by means of electricity to simulate life, but fo some reason or other his calculations are n correct and the doll refuses to respond to h efforts. Spying upon his operations are his a prentice and his maid, who are very much love with each other. The old toymaker, ho ever, has promised the maid to his son and apprentice is turned down.

Later the old fellow attends a masquer ball. The apprentice and the maid also de to go, and in looking about for something wear, the costume of the mechanical dol appropriated by the maid while the appre dresses as the devil. When the old man covers the maid at the ball he is at convinced that his doll has come to life makes a desperate effort to catch her. Wit help of the apprentice she escapes and gets to the workshop before the old toymaker. latter is so close upon her heels that sh no time to replace the costume. What happens is best told by the picture. I end, however, the old toymaker discover deception and the apprentice gets the mai the old man's blessings.

The brave fire laddies everywhere will be interested in the Edison subject entitled "Into the Jaws of Death." This is a drama intended more particularly to illustrate the methods employed by modern fire departments in saving life. There is a plot which adds interest to the picture. The interior of the fire house is shown, fire companies are seen rushing to answer the alarm, firemen scale walls of the building and carry the inmates out. The work of the firemen and the story of the lovers is fitted together nicely and a subject of double interest is produced.

EDISON TO PICTURE CHRISTMAS CAROL.

The Edison players have under way an elaborate production based on Dicken's "Christmas Carol" to be released for Christmas week.

HIS SERGEANT'S STRIPES

A Thrilling War Drama and Love Story of the Indian Country

THE test of man's nature is made when he has to choose between love and duty. If the biographies of history could be collected and examined, we fear that the human passion of love is the strongest and that the majority of men gone by have been ruled by love to a course from which duty would have led them otherwise.

Thus in Melies coming release "His Sergeant's Stripes," the young corporal in the United States army is put to this severe test. In order to win his sweetheart in marriage, he must win the extra stripe making him a sergeant. The commanding general at Fort Darrow gives him an important despatch containing a warning of the uprising of a band of Indians. In the successful fulfillment of his mission he would be promoted to the office of sergeant, secure his third stripe and his girl. Full of joy he meets his sweetheart in a woodland path and tells her of the message he has to carry, little thinking that an Indian spy was hidden in the bushes listening to his every word, and little knowing that this would be the cause of such serious trouble.

He goes his way by horseback and is followed by the band of Indians, who hound him until he is exhausted in mind and body, with only sufficient strength left to bear out the instructions of his superior officer, that in the event of impending capture to burn up the message. This he does just as he is killed by the red men who find his body, but not the despatch. The girl, feeling sure that her lover would return victorious, sews the third stripe on his coat sleeve, never even dreaming that it would only bear witness to his honor while he lay silent in the grave. He had won his stripes and his girl, but had lost his life in his country's service.

The picture besides being a thrilling one, is exceedingly interesting from a scenic standpoint, with its characteristic Indian costumes, bareback riding and beautiful country. This picture is released Nov. 17.

A GOOD RECORD.

A. H. Huelsman, operator of The Casino Theatre, Covington, Ky., communicates to the Film Index some very interesting facts. The Casino Theatre opened on Oct. 23, 1909, at which time Mr. Huelsman became its operator. He has continued in that capacity since without interruption and has in the year run 9,125,200 feet of film, and 4,680 songs on a Power's No. 5 Machine. He pays a slight tribute to the machine by saying that the expenses thereon in that tim have amounted to about $3.35.

Mr. Huelsman is a member of Local 165 Motion Picture Operators Union of Cincinnati. He has been an operator for five years and from the above record it is reasonable to conclude that he knows his business.

By James S McQuade

THE N. I. M. P. A. meeting at Cleveland, set for Friday and Saturday, Oct. 28 and 29, was really held on Saturday and Sunday, the first session lasting from 10:30 a. m. Saturday, until 1 a. m. Sunday, a second and shorter one being held Sunday afternoon.

As announced in advance by circular, no manufacturers participated in the business transacted, except as several of those in attendance were called upon from time to time to answer certain questions put them by members of the Alliance.

Tom Cochrane, David Horsley of the Nestor, Pat Powers and William Steiner, all directors or acting officials of the Sales Co., were present, as were also Mark Dittenfuss of the Champion, and S. S. Hutchinson and A. M. Kennedy of the American. About 25 exchanges were represented.

Among the more important questions considered were: C. O. D.'s, the opening of new exchanges in already congested districts, the changing of the two weeks' notification of cancellation to one week's, and the appointment of a general buyer for all the leading "independent" exchanges. As these were being considered in order, members of the Sales Co. were summoned to make reply; but Mr. Cochrane, who acted as spokesman for the Sales Co., stated that none of the officers present were there in an official capacity and, in consequence, that no reply could be made at that time. It was then arranged that a committee, selected by the members of the Alliance from their ranks, should meet the Sales Co., as a body, in New York, on Thursday, Nov. 3, Mr. Cochrane intimating that the demands of the Alliance would be considered and met in an amicable spirit.

A resolution was also passed by the unanimous vote of the Alliance to the effect that it was recommended that the Sales Co. admit the American Film Manufacturing Co. to its selling organization on an absolutely equal basis, as the members of the Alliance wanted the American's product. This question will also be considered and passed on at the New York meeting, and any attempt to sidetrack or evade it will probably lead to a repudiation of the Sales Co. by the N. I. M. P. A. At least that is the aspect of things, as represented to me by reliable authority.

I understand that the Sales Co. is in a pliant, if not a suppliant, mood and that a certain official among its officers, who has been receiving $200 per week for his services, will have the salary end lopped off before the New York meeting is adjourned.

Would it not be well for the Alliance Committee to order an inspection of the Sales Co.'s books at this New York meeting; that is, if there be any books to inspect? And might it not be well to examine the by-laws governing the actions of the Sales Co.; that is, if there be any such by-laws in existence?

"Assume a virtue, if you have it not," has been the policy of the Sales Co. thus far. With loud baying its members have been centering the attention of the "independent" rank and file on what they are pleased to call the "Trust." Let the "independent" rank and file now center attention nearer home and engage in a little house cleaning. It may astonish them to find that a modern Hercules may be required to cleanse this modern Augean stable.

Importance of Picture Theatre.

Dr. Samuel P. Capen, of the department of modern languages at Clark University, Worcester, Mass., is one of the latest among men of letters to champion the cause of the picture theatre. In his address given Thursday, Oct. 27, in Providence, R. I., before the high school section of the Rhode Island Institute of Instruction, Dr. Capen selected for his subject, "The Theatregoing Habit of School Children." He told of the work of an investigation, conducted at Worcester two and one-half years ago, of the attendance of school children at theatres. Of 5,000 children, aged from 8 to 15 years, 20 per cent. of the girls and 19 per cent. of the boys had never gone to the theatre. On the other hand, 20 per cent. of the girls and 30 per cent. of the boys went once a week or oftener. Of these 62 per cent. or 1,256, of the girls, and 65 per cent., or 1,286, of the boys attended the vaudeville theatre.

"The dramatic instinct," said Dr. Capen, "is universal and strongest in the child. The city furnishes the great opportunity for indulging this passion. Since the investigation above quoted the motion picture show has modified conditions. It has an average daily attendance throughout the country of 2,000,000, and outnumbers the other theatres 10,000 to 1,400. It presents drama in its simplest form.

"While the regular theatre is dominated by the idle class and the people who go to New York for a "time," THE MOTION PICTURE SHOW HAS A BETTER PATRONAGE, MORALLY. It is seen by clean, sober, working people, who are not seeking sensation and who tend to keep it clean.

"There is certainly a problem of health, lack of ventilation, etc. This can easily be remedied by a few stringent laws. The objection of darkness is unanswerable, for the pictures can as well be presented in a room with light enough to read in. THE WORST FEATURE OF THE MOTION PICTURE THEATRE IS THE CHEAP VAUDEVILLE BETWEEN THE FILMS, WHICH IS NOT NECESSARY, AS SHOWN BY THE POPULARITY OF THOSE SHOWS WHICH OMIT IT. The Board of Censors has passed upon three-quarters of the films now being shown, and they are clean. Crime is presented in all drama, but nowhere is the retribution so swift and sure as in the motion picture. Surely this is moral.

"The fault is that in the past commercial interests have been allowed to control the theatre. It is now time for us to take up the problem. EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS, SCHOOLS AND CHURCHES SHOULD USE THE FACILITIES PRESENTED IN THE MOTION PICTURE.

"I CONSIDER THE MOTION PICTURE WELL WORTH WHILE, BUT NOT, OF COURSE, IN EXCESS."

Exhibitors Prefer Leaflet Bulletin.

For some time past the manufacturer and importer's bulletin, issued bi- or tri-monthly, as the case may be, has been under careful consideration. Many of these bulletins cost, as shown by rough computation, nearly $9,000 yearly, and some of them over that figure. They are, in fact, attractive, well edited booklets, tastefully illustrated and containing much valuable information for the exhibitor.

Now the question has arisen as to their utility. Do they, in their present form, meet the intentions of manufacturers and importers by serving the purpose of exhibitors in the best manner possible.

There was only one way to ascertain this, and that was by putting the question direct to the exhibitors themselves. George Kleine and the Selig Polyscope Co. recently sent out circular letters to exhibitors, requesting them to reply if they were in favor of the bulletin in booklet form, as at present, or in leaflet form, printed on one side only.

The answers represented pretty well every section of the United States, except the Pacific Coast, and the combined result shows a regular landslide in favor of the leaflet form, printed on one side only, with the title in good, bold type. Over 88 per cent. of the replies were for the leaflet bulletin and less than 22 per cent. for the booklet.

The preference for the leaflet is explained by the fact that it can be used in the lobby for advertising purposes, many patrons being desirous to know the story, as told briefly. Then again it can be filed away and is easy for reference at any time, whereas the booklet makes it more difficult to find a subject when filed away and besides its leaf being printed on both sides prevents its use in the lobby.

Quite a number of the replies referred to the Kalem bulletin as the best now issued, the Biograph being second. The bold type in which the title is printed on the Kalem bulletin is especially commended, and nearly all of the replies in favor of the leaflet form expressed the hope that a leaflet bulletin, of uniform size, would soon be issued by all licensed manufacturers and importers. This uniformity in size, it is suggested, would enable every exhibitor to have a file on hand that would save much time and worry.

I understand that the Selig Polyscope Co. and George Kleine have already taken steps to meet the wishes of the exhibitors, and I suppose it will be only a short time until the uniform size bulletin will be issued by all licensed manufacturers and importers.

Most certainly it will mean a great saving all around, in addition to giving greater satisfaction to exhibitors.

The Government to Re-Imburse Film Importers.

The "Moving Picture World," in its issue of Nov. 5, page 1047, had the following paragraph, under the heading as given herewith:

FILM WILL PAY DUTY AS PHOTOGRAPHS, NOT AS CELLULOID.

Moving picture films made in Europe will now come into the United States at a much lower rate of duty than heretofore. The Customs Court, Washington, on October 28 decided the films should be assessed as photographs at a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem. The Board of General Appraisers at New York had contended that they were dutiable as celluloid at a much higher rate.

This statement is ridiculous, as moving picture films pay a specific duty of 1½ cents per foot under the present tariff, which has been in force since 1909.

The facts of the case are these:

Under the Dingley tariff of 1897, which was in force until August, 1909, there was no provision made for motion picture films and the Government appraisers classified them as manufactures of celluloid, which pay a duty of 25 per cent. on the value and, in addition, 65 cents per pound on weight. The importers protested against this classification, maintaining that motion picture films were properly classified as photographs, dutiable at 25 per cent. without the specific duty of 65 cents per pound.

Protest against improper rates of duty was first considered by the Board of General Appraisers, who decided against the importers when these cases first came up about four years ago. The importers chiefly concerned were Pathe Freres and George Kleine, who succeeded in having the question reconsidered. The Board of Appraisers then decided in favor of the importers.

The Government then appealed the case to the Circuit Court of the United States, which also decided in favor of the importers.

The Government next made a further appeal to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, the highest authority in a position to review the cases, and that Court also decided in favor of the importers. There is no further action possible by the Government, except a refund of the duties exacted contrary to the law.

These decisions are in line with common sense, as no one except a Government appraiser could deny that motion picture films are photographs, nor maintain that they are manufactures of celluloid, like combs, etc. The effect of the decisions will be the reimbursement of the importers at the rate of 65 cents per pound on all imported films covered by their protests. The amount involved in these cases is at least $250,000.

The Portuguese Revolution Filmed.

George Kleine announces the release of a Gaumont film for Nov. 19, which pictures "Lisbon Before and During the Revolution." The views were taken Friday, Oct. 7, by Gaumont's special Paris representative, and they give a typical representation of the change which had taken place in Lisbon.

Great crowds are seen in the public squares, also the barricades which had been hurriedly built, the soldiers on guard, and wounded men and horses. Excited mobs of the lower and middle classes are viewed as they rush hither and thither seeking the latest news.

The Republican flag is seen floating in many sections, some of them placed on buildings that have been shattered by shells from the warships in the harbor. Excellent views of the Royal Palace are unfolded, gaping holes being plainly seen in its walls and windows, bearing testimony to the true marksmanship of the gunners of the disloyal fleet. Problems of the Photoplay Operator Discussed and Questions Answered

Edited by Will C. Smith

Newark, N. J., writes—that he has been using an Edison Moving Picture Machine for the last six months and has never broken a condenser until last Monday, the proprietor of the theatre opened a new place and bought a new Edison Moving Picture Machine and transferred him (the operator) over to the new place. In four days he broke four condensers. Says he tried running the machine with the top of the lamp house open and also with the back of the lamp house open and also tried running machine with lamphouse closed, but in spite of all his condensers continued to break. Says he is drawing about 35 amperes and wants to know how he can remedy the breaking of condensers.

Answer—The breaking of condensers is due to unequal expansion or contraction caused by sudden extreme changes in temperature. Your condensers should be in the case so as to have enough room for expansion or contraction, also there should be enough ventilation in the case so as to allow the condensers to keep the same temperature. The writer has found that by putting a small strip of asbestos cord around the edge of the condenser, so that the condenser does not come in contact with the metal in the condenser case, that it was a big help, as condensers most of the time crack as soon as the arc is off, which is due to sudden change of temperature.

Mr. Fontona, Danville, Ill., writes that he is about to work with a Portable Gas-Making outfit and wants to know if the operation is the same as the Oxygen and Hydrogen tanks, and what is Oxone.

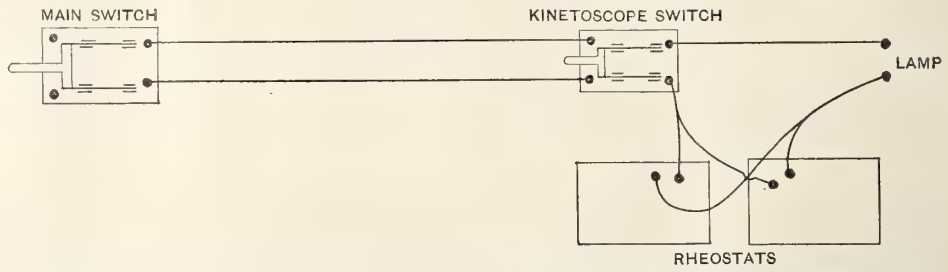
Answer—(1) For those who are unfamiliar with the use of a Portable Gas-Making outfit it may be well to state that the operation is identical as for the operation of Oxygen and Hydrogen cylinders.

(2) Oxone is a compact compound which on contact with water generates pure Oxygen Gas in the same manner as calcium carbide in water produces acetylene gas. Oxone is a fused mass—a preparation of Fused Sodium Peroxide of the specific gravity 2.43; it is hard, but not brittle, and capable of being cast into any convenient shape; it can be easily transported without detriment or any mechanical or chemical change, and can, when protected from moisture, be stored without any danger or risk of deterioration. Oxone furthermore has the property of absorbing carbon dioxide and moisture, qualities which, combined with an oxidizing ability, makes it an ideal disinfectant and air purifier.

J. W. Bermuda writes—I have tried the black cloth in back of my screen, as you suggested, and find that it is a dandy idea and I thank you for your information. Now, what I would like to know is how to improve the light, that is—to make it good and bright; I am using A. C. current 104 volts and one rheostat. If I should use two rheostats would I get any better results? I am working about 60 ft. from the screen and my picture is about 15 ft. Also, when I use the lamp for song slides I find that the slides are much larger than the screen and that I have a blue circle all around the light on the screen. Can you advise me what to do? Do you think if I used a hard carbon on the bottom I would get a better light?

Answer—I am very pleased to know that you have taken advantage of my advice and put a black cloth back of your screen, as from the writer's experience it helps the light wonderfully.

(1) If you use two rheostats in multiples, as per sketch you would get a much better light than with one rheostat. The idea of having two rheostats in multiples is to increase the light.



CONNECTIONS FOR TWO RHEOSTATS CONNECTED IN MULTIPLE WITH LAMP.

(2) Taking it for granted that the distance and the size of the picture that you give are correct, I would say that you are using about a 2½-in. B. F. Motion Picture Lens and the size Stereo. Lens which you should have to match this Motion Picture Lens (as near as possible) is a 12-in. B. F. Stereo. Lens. The way to find out the focus of a Stereo. Lens or a Motion Picture Lens: Hold the lens as it would be in the machine using the wall as a background and the window as a source of light with the front end of the lens towards the window and the back end towards the wall and then measure from the wall to the back of the lens and this will give you the focus. Projecting lenses are made of two sets of lens mounted in a tube at a distance from each other bearing the focal length of the lens. The longer the focal length the greater will be the distance between the two lenses. In ordering lenses always give the size of screen and distance the machine sets from screen and the size of picture wanted. If you will refer to my article in the Film Index, of October 29th, you will find a table that will enable you to figure out lenses. This is something all operators should know.

(3) To get the blue circle out of the light, move the lamp (arc) back from the condensers. After doing this should you find the spot for the motion picture, is not as it should be, then take the back condenser and put it in front and put the front condenser in back. If this does not help it any then try two 7½-in. condensers. I am sure one or the other will help you out of your trouble.

(4) On Alternating Current you do not use hard carbons. Use only soft cored carbons in order to get a good even light. When working on Direct Current you use one soft carbon on top and one hard carbon on bottom.

B. B. Philadelphia, writes—I am working with a Lubin Machine, 60 feet from screen and the booth is at the side of the theatre and I find that my picture is larger on one side than it is on the other. Would like to know how to get it so I can have a picture that is the same size on both sides.

Answer—The distance does not make any difference as to the picture being small on one side and large on the other. The difference in size is due to the fact that you are working at an angle and that your screen is set the same as if you were working directly in the center of the house. The best way to remedy this is to put your screen on the same angle as your machine, what I mean by that is to bring the side of the screen nearest to you out about three feet and in that way your screen will be on about the same angle as your machine and you will find that this will do away with the picture being small on one side and large on the other. In fact, it will give you the same results as if you were working directly in the center of the house with your screen in the same position as you now have it.

It is very gratifying to know that there are a few operators who take such an interest in their show as you do. Would like to hear from you as to the results you obtain.

MAKING IMPROVEMENTS.

The Idle Hour, the popular theatre, at 429 Franklin street, Michigan City, Ind., is undergoing repairs. A handsome lobby ten feet deep will be constructed, the floor lowered, and a large and showy front installed, which will be decorated in plastic relief work to be furnished by the Decorators' Supply company of Chicago.

Some time ago, the management installed a modern cooling and ventilating plant; this, together with distributing fans, has made the Idle Hour a most comfortbale theatre in the city during the hot summer months. The seats are the best in the opera line, having a special spring, which raises the seat automatically when not in use, thus allowing the occupants to pass in and out with greater ease.

Michigan City will have in the Idle Hour in the future a show place that will not only be a credit to the city, but educational as well, and a popular place to spend an evening. During the three and a half years that this theatre has been in operation, licensed films have always been used and the theatre has never been closed.

After the remodeling is finished and the theatre is again opened to the public, the management will be glad to see all its old patrons back again, with many new ones added to the list. The pictures in the future will be kept up to the high standard that they always have been in the past.

NEW HOUSE FOR NASHVILLE.

The "Palace" will be the name of a new photoplay theatre that is to open on Fifth avenue, Nashville, Tenn., just south of the Fifth Avenue theatre. A stock company is back of the enterprise, and W. P. Ready, who so successfully conducted another house at one time, will be general manager. The new house is now being remodeled. It is to be elaborately decorated, and an unusually good system of ventilation arranged. Mr. Ready says that the house will use only "first run" pictures, or pictures that have never been shown anywhere until the day they are put on in Nashville, and at other places, all being released the same day.

"SUSPICION"

The Vitagraph "Life Portrayal"

NO one can realize what it means to have the dearest idol of one's heart taken from them unless they have experienced the same bereavement. The mother love is the strongest emotion in human nature; the father's affections are less sensitive and he is built of vastly different fibre.

When Mrs. Hall's little daughter dies, her husband tries to divert her mind from her loss but she will not be comforted. The void cannot be filled or her grief assuaged by philosophic reasoning or superficial diversion. Her most cherished hope and life's joy has been blasted and she longs for it continually; nothing else will satisfy it and she is led to take an interest in children who have been deprived of that which she yearns to give, mother love. Every day she goes to a neighboring orphan asylum where she is seen making the little ones happy in every way she can.

In further expression of her feelings and satisfaction of her heart's desire she arranges with the superintendent of the institution to place a tablet in the children's room to the memory of her daughter.

The husband notices that she is very often absent from home during the day and comes home late in the evening. He questions her but she is afraid to tell her husband and evades his inquiries. He becomes suspicious and employs a detective to follow her and learn where she spends so much of her time. The detective traces her to the orphans' home, reports to her husband and together they go to the home only to find her busily engaged entertaining and helping the children and satisfying the great tenderness of her soul engendered by thoughts of her dead child.

Her husband is nonplussed and when she leads him to the tablet on the wall which she has dedicated to the memory of her daughter, he is ashamed of his unjust and uncalled for suspicious, aroused by his inability to fathom the depths of mother love which so often surpasses man's understanding and appreciation.

This is a beautiful picture drama, carrying a conviction to the heart as well as the mind the grandeur and sacredness of the theme—mother love. It will give those who have never known what it means a higher regard and a greater respect for those who gave them birth and the mothers of their children. In other words, it is a "Life Portrayal" that brings plainly before us a lesson that elevates and refines all mankind.

WILL PLAY IN PHOTOPLAY HOUSES

This Is the Proposition of Charles Frohman if Others Don't Come to Terms.

Unless the managers in the New England states, who have ignored the demands of Charles Frohman by closing their houses to his productions, come to terms within the next few days, that well known manager has declared he will fight them in their own den.

Mr. Frohman, who is at present in Boston rehearsing Sir Conan Doyle's new play, declares that he will produce his attractions in all the New England cities, and if he can't get the best houses in those cities, he will put on his shows in the largest photoplay and vaudeville theatres.

It is the intention of Mr. Frohman, as soon as the Boston season opens, to send an advance man to the different New England towns and make arrangements to book his attractions at such houses as he can get, regardless to what other managers attempt to do. He is under the impression that this scheme will be sufficient to bring the belligerent managers around.

EMPRESS PHOTOPLAY THEATRE OPENS

Peoria House Creates Big Impression on Patrons Who Keep It Crowded Nightly

Of the many fall events to take place in Peoria, Ill., none created more attention than the opening of the Empress photoplay theatre, which was celebrated last week. For a long time the theatre-going public had been looking forward to the opening night with much eagerness, and when the doors were thrown open for the initial performance, the crowd was so great that it took all the police could do to keep the entrance on Main street from being blocked.

The house will run pictures and illustrated songs only, the management will see that a change of program is made every day, and that only the best of licensed pictures will be run. The house will open at 11 o'clock in the morning and will close at 11 o'clock at night.

The Empress is, without doubt, one of the prettiest little photoplay theatres in Illinois; it is decorated in a most artistic manner, and has been the admiration of hundreds of patrons. The interior of the house is in gold, with woodwork in gold veneer and the walls and ceiling in canary and strawberry tint. The lobby, which is a replica of the entrance to an ancient old castle in which lived some beautiful and lovely princess, is in old gold and beautifully matched marble.

So far as the safety of the house is concerned the management has carefully looked after that important factor. Besides a number of exits, there has been installed a most modern fire proof machine booth. The curtain is also fireproof. The house seats 500 persons.

PICTURES OF FIGHTING WHALES.

A large force of experienced men who have for decades followed the singing harpoon line will leave Seattle, Wash., in a few days on a queer mission. Employed by the representatives of a motion picture company, these old whale hunters will again and again enact the work of harpooning, killing and stripping of the blubber of a North Pacific whale. The reproduction of the subject will be widely advertised, for never before has the picturing of whale hunting been attempted.

The whaling crew will reach the water north of Vancouver Island for one of the great sulphur bottom whales, which are such ardent fighters once a harpoon is safely stuck into their backs. The cameras and other apparatus is being arranged on the former whaling vessel, Finnigan, and the supplies for a six-week cruise are being stored away in the hold. Some of the oldest whalers in the business will be taken along to add local color to the pictures.

PHOTOPLAY THEATRE FOR MUSCATINE, IA.

Upon the recommendation of the fire committee the city council of Muscatine, Ia., has granted a license to Richard and Adam Von Dresky to erect a photoplay theatre on Sycamore street. The house will be of steel, cement and brick construction, will be fireproof, and one of the finest exclusive pictures houses in the state. The building will be 40 by 90 feet, and will be built according to plans approved by the fire committee. When completed the house will seat 600 persons, and will be the largest of its kind in the state. The front will be stucco, and will have an arched effect which will be studded with many electric lights. It is expected that the house will be ready for the opening performance some time in December.

THE OPERATOR IS THE MAN

Can Make or Break a Show—Must Know What to Do in Case of Emergency

When the president and one of the largest syndicates in the United States, controlling a chain of motion picture theatres extending from New York to Cincinnati, tendered to the directors of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York city a certified check for $300,000, which he was willing to give in payment of one year's rental of the Metropolitan for motion pictures, it showed to what extent the motion picture industry has grown as a source of entertainment to the American amusement loving public.

And when you go to see motion pictures, whether in the first-class theatre or the nickel house, there is one man upon whom the whole picture show practically depends, one man who can either make or mar the entire entertainment for which you have paid your admission, and that man is—not the proprietor whose capital is invested in the show, not the manager who gives out orders so promiscuously, but a man you don't see at all, perhaps way up in a little 6x7 coop near the roof, the chap they call "the operator."

He it is upon whom the responsibility rests of giving you pictures that you can see and enjoy, or the other kind, that now you see them and now you don't.

Operators are, like other people, of all kinds, qualities, sizes and nationalities, says the New York Press. Even the two sexes are represented, for up in Connecticut there is at least one female motion picture operator, a young Italian girl, who not only runs the machine, but is manager of the place as well. Some operators are very competent and dependable. Others, either from ignorance or carelessness, never are to be depended upon and are unsatisfactory to a high degree. This is known as the "punk" variety. There are operators who sometimes are good and sometimes bad, variable and erratic, sometimes getting a first-class picture and at other times succeeding only in playing the mischief generally with every thing they touch.

Occasionally there will be an operator who is all "nerves." Such a man may get good results, so long as things run smoothly, but let something go wrong and he is at once up in the air and goes all to pieces. One of these nervous ones, while running a show one time, lost his light (the electric light which illuminates the picture.)

Now, the only trouble was that the carbon sticks between the points of which the light is produced had become too far separated so that the electric current would not flow across the arc. But when the light went out this operator, instead of bringing the carbons together again and so once more lighting the lamp, opened the door of the magazine which contained one of the reels of film in another entirely separate part of the machine quite removed from the lamp to see if the light had gone into the magazine, a proceeding so absurd as to be laughable.

This same operator was once "dissolving" the slides for an illustrated song by placing his hand over the stereopticon lens while substituting one slide for the next, and forgot to remove his hand from in front of the lens, so that there was no light shining on the sheet. He looked at the curtain, and seeing no picture being shown, thought he had lost his light again, until, removing his hand from the lens to fix the lamp, the pictures at once of course, reappeared on the sheet.

There is another class of operators who are careless and indifferent as to what results they get. They permit the picture to remain out of frame on the sheet until the audience stamps or whistles its disapproval or the piano player, by a series of discords, attracts the operator's attention to the fact that part of one picture and part of another are appearing on the sheet at the same time.

Sometimes the operator allows the picture to remain out of focus instead of at once bringing the details out clearly and distinctly as he should by properly adjusting the focusing screws on his lens. Sometimes the light goes out or is permitted to become dim because it is not "fed" as it should be.

The light may not be properly distributed over the sheet, so that some parts of the picture are dark and some light. A good operator who attends to everything, as it should be attended to, is a jewel, but unfortunately his name is not legion.

What is known as a reel of film usually contains about 1000 feet of pictures. Each foot of film has on it 16 pictures. One complete revolution of the crank on a moving picture machine releases one foot of film, or 16 pictures. This crank is turned at the rate of from 40 to 66 times a minute. It follows that at the latter rate of speed there are being shown on the sheet more than 1000 separate pictures every minute the machine is in operation.

When you go to the moving picture show you are seeing 1000 individual pictures every minute you are watching them on the screen. Do you realize how rapidly the pictures are in motion and wonder that they are, indeed, rightly called motion pictures?

Sometimes, though, the operator is blamed for what he is really not responsible for. In some motion picture theatres, the smaller ones especially, where seating capacity is limited, it is the practice to empty the house after each show and various devices are resorted to in order to get the patrons out after they have seen one complete performance. It may be that the operator is told to put on a reel that has been shown only perhaps half an hour before when he still has reels that have not been shown at all. This is known as a "chaser."

Sometimes an announcement slide is thrown on the screen "This concludes the performance. Those who have not seen the entire show may remain, others will please pass out."

Half-tickets are sometimes given by the man at the door and these half-tickets are collected at intervals, so if you have no half-ticket you must give way to others who have. But where these "chasing" tactics are resorted to, in nearly every instance the operator is instructed to run the film through so rapidly that it is often very hard to tell what the pictures are all about.

A reel that should properly take 16 minutes is run through in 12 or perhaps even 7 minutes. The movements of the people and animals become contortions, and sedate, ministerial-looking persons behave like jumping-jacks.

The whole performance is grotesque and unsatisfactory, and the operator is blamed for spoiling the show. In reality the operator is only following his instructions to "grind her through" as fast as possible and "chase" the crowd so as to make room for others. It is the boss's fault, not the operator's, in this instance.

Operators receive salaries varying from $15 to $45 a week and work from 40 minutes a day to 12 hours, according to where they work and for whom. Some houses will not take a man on at less than $18 a week. They figure if he is not worth that he is not worth anything to them. Some operators are treated like princes and others,—well, different. Some booths are roomy and comfortable, some cramped and hot. It all depends upon the theatre and its proprietor.

But no matter where the place or how the operator is treated—and it is good policy to treat the operator right if the proprietor wishes himself to be treated right—if results are looked for, and a pleased audience does not look for these from the fancy front and other surface indications of attractiveness.

After all, remember what "makes the show" is up out of sight in a metal booth, away from the audience altogether. Three things there are, some reels of film, a machine and—the operator.

Without the latter there could be no show. He never has his name in big letters in front of the house. His name is sometimes not even known by the other employes of the place. To them he is simply and only "the operator," but, nevertheless, when it comes to giving credit where credit should be due if the show is what it should be, don't forget the man up there in the coop, the man behind the moving pictures.—(New Bedford Mercury.)

WILL BUILD NEW HOUSE AT LODI.

Owing to the increasing business at the photoplay theatre, Lodi, Cal., proprietor Henry Lighthouse has found it necessary to build a new theatre in that town. For the past three months business has increased wonderfully in that section of the state and proprietors of picture houses throughout San Joaquin county have either had to increase the seating capacity or make preparations to build additional houses. While the plans for the new house are not complete, Manager Lighthouse claims that the proposed new theatre will not be surpassed by any other north of San Francisco.

"THE LITTLE PROSPECTOR"

A Western Dramatic Photoplay by the Essanay

THE motion picture producer must have something of the artist's appreciation of beauty, of scenic effect, to be thoroughly successful. Although his story may be a strong one, pulsating with human and heart interest, his acting talent the best, shabby settings or scenic backgrounds may kill the interest.

The Essanay Company are especially noted for the beautiful scenic features of their most excellent Western subjects. The Essanay Western pictures are made in the West, in the very heart of the Rockies, amidst scenes the beauty of which cannot be simulated. There is an advantage to this, in more ways than one. The roughly clothed miner or the cowboy, picturesque in his chaps, is set down in his element. There is something genuine about him and his environment. Scenic America always appeals to the eastern American, another reason, perhaps, for the popularity of the Essanay Western pictures.

"The Little Prospector" is the Essanay Company's Western offering for next week. The story is a novel one, with a bright vein of human interest and many incidents of excellent dramatic qualities. The scenes are laid amidst the most rugged and wild parts of the Rockies, which will make it doubly attractive and acceptable with the photoplay lovers.

Silas Kendall, a prospector, and his daughter, Nell, so the story goes, are prospecting in the mountains, a few miles above Canyon City, a little western town and the basis of supplies for the hundreds of more or less successful gold prospectors. Kendall has built him a cabin and he and his daughter, a robust little woman, have managed to eke out a living, always living in hopes of some day making the "big strike." Kendall is old and not thoroughly responsible at times. In fact, his simplicity and childish trust in all strangers has earned him the uncomplimentary title of a half-wit. Twice before our story opens he has lost two valuable claims because of his two freely proclaiming his finds with the consequence that his claims have been staked by other prospectors.

The story opens showing Kendall and his daughter leaving the cabin for the hills. The girl works with him until close to the noon hour, when she lays aside her pick and shovel to return to the cabin and prepare dinner. While she is thus engaged there is a knock at the door and a young miner, Hal Martin, steps in. Martin has accidentally wounded himself in the arm while cleaning his gun and applies to the girl for help. She assists him to bind the wound and thanking her he leaves, after bashfully asking to be permitted to call again.

Kendall, at work in the hills, is about to give up in despair when he turns up two small nuggets and other fine pay dirt. With a glad cry he springs to his feet and hurries back to the cabin. Showing the specimens to Nell, he tells her he is going down to Canyon City and have them assayed. Nell, however, pleads with him not to do so, having in mind the other two valuable claims which he had unwittingly lost. He finally gives in and during the old man's absence from the room she hides the specimens in a coffee pot.

Kendall returns and while Nell is busy outside finds the specimens and slips out of the room.

At the town store the old miner shows the specimens to a number of miners and despite the entreaties of the old storekeeper they entice Kendall to tell them the location of the mine.

Nell returns to the cabin shortly after her father has left, finds the coffee pot on the floor and the specimens gone. She is about to give up in despair when there is a knock at the door and Hal Martin enters. The frantic girl explains her troubles and pleads with Martin to help her save the claim.

At the store the old man has boastfully told of the rich vein and minutely described it to the other miners, who, when satisfied they will have no trouble in finding the location, run out of the store, mount and ride away.

Back at the cabin Martin has listened to the story and tells the girl they must race back to the claim and beat the others to it. The girl quickly saddles a horse, Martin mounts his own and the race to stake the claim begins.

The scenes alternate between the miners and the girl and Martin. However, Martin and the girl arrive just in time, and while Martin holds the others off with his gun, the girl stakes the claim. The others, realizing they are beaten, turn away, leaving Nell and Hal alone.

SELIG TO MAKE PICTURES IN FLA.

According to the Times-Union, Jacksonville, T. A. Persons, of the Selig Poloscope Company of Chicago, has been in Jacksonville, for several days making arrangements for the bringing there of at least 160 animals and from fifty to sixty men employed by the big concern. The actual work started Monday, Oct. 21.

The collection of animals includes elephants, tigers, lions, and all such as are owned by a first-class menagerie. All of them are of the highly trained sort too, and are among the most costly and valuable in captivity. The horses owned by the concern are especially valuable and are trained through the most painstaking care for the work.

One part of the equipment is fifteen real American Indians, who have been in the service of the Selig company for a number of years. The Indians are used in a number of the most entertaining films of the great service. Besides the Everglade and Seminole Indian scenes, tropical effects will be worked in at a good advantage over this territory.

TWO NEW THEATRES FOR CLEVELAND.

Within the next two weeks Cleveland, O., will have two more first class photoplay theatres, which will rank with the best in the Forest City. The two houses will be the Superior, on Superior avenue, and the Lincoln, on West 25th street. The Superior, which will seat 750 persons, will be one of the most model picture theatres in the country. Manager George W. Heinbuch is seeing that every convenience for his patrons will be installed and that only the best entertainment will be put on. The cost of the house, when completed, will be $17,000. The Lincoln, under the management of M. A. Walters, will also be a model place for lovers of pictures and will cost $15,000.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyr ight by J. H. Hallberg.
All Rights Reserved.

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 10.—The transformer when reducing a high voltage is called "step-down" transformer; when increasing the voltage, it is called "step-up" transformer.

The transformer has three distinct parts: The laminated iron core, the primary winding and the secondary winding.

The number of turns of the primary and secondary windings determine the ratio of transformation.

"ELECTRICAL TALK" NO. 11.

In "Electrical Talk" No. 10, we discussed the "Constant Potential" alternating current transformer and from the elementary description given therein you were advised that such a transformer may be used either as a "step-up" or a "step-down" transformer, depending upon the way it is connected.

"Constant Potential" means steady or constant voltage and when used in connection with a transformer it signifies that a change in voltage is required and that the delivered voltage must be maintained constant, or steady, irrespective of the load. A constant potential transformer is the type required for electric power, incandescent lamps and constant potential arc lamps such as usually employed in factories, stores and theatres.

It is not an easy matter to design and construct a transformer which will regulate well, that is, hold the voltage steady, whether one lamp or entire number of lamps connected are burning. If the transformer does not regulate well the voltage will be high when only a few lamps are burning and as more lamps or motors are switched on the voltage will drop lower and lower. Modern transformers are constructed to give a practically constant voltage irrespective of the load, and the regulating quality of a constant potential transformer depends mainly upon the amount of magnetic leakage. If the magnetic leakage is great the transformer will not regulate well and the voltage will drop more and more as additional load is put on.

Figure 20 illustrates a transformer having considerable magnetic leakage because the primary and secondary coils are some distance apart and are mounted on separate legs of the iron core. When the line current passes through the primary coil it generates magnetism in the iron core and the current being alternating this magnetism is reversed a given number of times per second, depending upon the frequency of the current. If the secondary coil is not connected to any load the magnetism will pass through the iron as indicated by the arrows, first in one direction, then when the current reverses in the other direction performing no work, simply keeping the iron core "excited," and the secondary coil under magnetic tension. If we should now put load on the secondary coil as indicated by the arc lamp in Figure 21, all of the magnetism will no longer pass through the core legs upon which the secondary coil is mounted but some of the magnetic lines of force will crowd over the air gap between the primary and secondary coils and these lines are therefore lost and are of no use in producing voltage in the secondary coil, allowing the voltage in the secondary to drop when the arc lamp is turned on.

Therefore, you can understand that a transformer built as illustrated in Figures 20 and 21 is a very poor constant potential transformer, in fact it would not do at all, unless a given number of lamps were always burning at the same time, because the voltage would fluctuate up and down as the number of lamps were decreased or increased.

In view of the above it becomes necessary to place the primary and secondary coils of a constant potential transformer very close together and, as a matter of fact, modern transformers are built in sections with the primary and secondary windings sandwiched between each other and in some instances the windings are one on top of the other as illustrated in Figures 22 and 23, in order to minimize the magnetic leakage.

The core for a transformer may be of many different shapes. The type which has been previously illustrated is called the "core type," having two magnetic legs.

Figure 24 illustrates another type also much used which is called the "shell type" transformer. In this design there are three legs, the middle one is usually of double the cross-section as compared with the two outside legs and the primary and secondary coils are mounted on the middle leg as illustrated.

Either the core type or shell type transformer gives satisfactory results and there are certain advantages claimed for both types. As a matter of fact as far as efficiency and regulation is concerned there is not much choice and either one may be used with safety and satisfactory results. The determining factor in making a selection of the two being simply a matter of choice with the designer.

Summary.

The constant potential transformer must have the lowest possible amount of magnetic leakage in order to maintain the voltage constant irrespective of the amount of load on its secondary.

In order to reduce the amount of magnetic leakage, the primary and secondary coils of a Constant Potential transformer should be mounted very close together or one on top of the other on the same core leg.

Next talk will further discuss the alternating current transformer.

GOOD BUSINESS IN BUFFALO.

According to a report from Buffalo, N. Y., that city is fast becoming one of the centers for the photoplay business. Today, Buffalo boasts of having some of the finest picture houses to be found anywhere, and her citizens keep up the interest in these theatres by crowding them nightly.

Only a short time ago Buffalo had few such theatres and there was but little interest shown in that line of amusement, but of late the business has so increased that more first class theatres have been added and a better standard of pictures have been shown, and now all the houses are well patronized.

One of the features of the trade that taxes the ingenuity of the exhibitor is just what kind of pictures will take with the people of given communities. It is said that those in the East are fond of wild west scenes, while those whose homes are in the "Wooly West" are more interested in Eastern life. Biblical and educational subjects also interest many and pictures whose subjects are based on some famous dramas and books receive their share of popularity. Travel pictures are always appreciated.

PICTURES FOR MINNEAPOLIS SCHOOLS.

Having found the use of phonographs in the Minneapolis city schools a decided success, President Elwell of the board is arranging for the installation of motion picture machines in all school buildings having auditoriums or assembly halls.

Descriptive schemes of different countries, geographical subjects and industrial pictures will be shown to the students at stated intervals, and it is believed by Mr. Elwell and the board that the innovation will prove successful.

In a large number of the schools in which phonographs have been installed to teach the children to sing regular concerts are held, which are greatly enjoyed and are at the same time instructive. The children got their first insight of the beauty and depth of grand opera and were made to understand the selections of the great singers by the teachers. Lectures are to be given on the motion pictures by the teachers.

"HANK AND LANK, LIFE SAVERS."—At Coney Island Hank and Lank restfully watching the sad sea waves find that they are again strapped, while promises of a square meal seem scant and improbable. However, Lank sets his fertile mind to working and suddenly arrives at an idea.

"I tell you what we'll do, Hank," he says, "let's be life savers."

Then he reveals his plan. He will get the job and Hank will purposely attempt to get drowned, and Lank will wade in and save him, thus winning a reward and possibly an increase in salary.

The scheme works splendidly. Hank plays the suicide and wades into the water. Lank is summoned and gallantly goes to his aid and drags him sputtering back to the beach. Lank is proclaimed a hero and a purse is subscribed to, while a bright medal is hung upon his breast. Whereat he quits his job.

Hank now desires to become a life-saver and share in the glory and the two hie themselves to another beach. Hank dons a bathing suit and Lank reconnoitres along the beach to find some suitable place in which to drown himself.

However, Hank bobs down in a boat and is soon off to slumberland, unmindful of the near tragedy which is occuring at that moment out in the deep.

Lank, who is conscientiously fulfilling his part of the contract, gets into deep water and is rescued by another beach swimmer, while Hank and his boat is dragged into the water by other bathers. Hank awakens when he splashes overboard and strikes out violently for the shore, where he finds Lank being rolled over a barrel by his rescuers. Hank then beats it, fearful of what might happen were Lank to catch him just then.

"THE MASQUERADE COP."—Our little friend, Blinks, has received an invitation to a swell mask ball and after much thought as to how he shall be costumed he decides to go as a policeman. We see him in his room dressing in his uniform, swelled up with the confidence of making a tremendous hit with the ladies.

Blinks boards a street car, lounging on the rear platform, gayly swinging his club. Inside there is an altercation between one of the passengers and the conductor. The former is smoking and refuses to cease, despite the efforts of the conductor to make him stop it. Finally the conductor sees Blinks and assuming he is a real policeman summons him and tells him to arrest the smoker. Blinks protests, but finally summons courage and endeavors to put the man off. However, the man throws Blinks off and continues contentedly smoking.

Blinks picks himself up and determines to walk the rest of the way. However, he has walked but a short way when two boys run up to him and inform him that a man in a neighboring house is being murdered by his wife. Blinks is again dragged off to enforce the law, but after vainly endeavoring to stop the quarrel is thrown out of the window by the irate husband and wife, whose favorite pastime he has unwittingly attempted to spoil.

Later Blinks is appealed to by a young lady who is being molested by a masher. Blinks surveys the big fellow and quakes with fear, hiding shamefully behind the woman's skirt. The masher laughs and gives Blinks a good kick, when a real policeman approaches and arrests Blinks for impersonating an officer.

He is taken to the police station, where he is stripped of his clothes and sent home in a barrel. Taught a lasting lesson, Blinks resolves that he will never again try to attend a mask ball in such regalia.

"THE MARKED TRAIL."—Pinto, the bandit, in his rendezvous in the mountains, learns from a newspaper report that Marie Canby, the niece of Judge Canby, an Arizona millionaire, is to arrive at her uncle's ranch that day. Marie has been in the East attending school. Pinto knows that the ride from the station to the judge's ranch is through certain dangerous and wild parts of the mountains, and concluding that her escort will not exceed the numbers of his own band, makes plans to kidnap the girl and hold her for ransom.

Despite the protestations of his half-breed wife, Pinto and his men leave, and an hour later return to the mountain rendezvous with their prisoner. The girl is frightened but self-possessed, and immediately sets about to make her escape. Pinto endeavors to make her sign a note to the judge demanding payment for her ransom, but she indignantly destroys it, and Pinto leaves in a rage.

Marie at last arrives at a plan by which she believes she can effect an escape. Feigning illness she sends Pinto's wife for her captor. Pinto is deceived, and realizing that the girl, dead, would be valueless to him, orders his wife to ride to the village for the doctor.

The doctor is summoned and is met by Pinto and his gang. He is blindfolded and led down a rocky defile, which ends at the door of Pinto's cavern. There he is told to administer to the girl, with his life as a penalty if he fails to cure her. The doctor immeingly: "Have courage, I will rescue you."

Pinto, finding his patient has considerably improved diately sees the girl's trick and whispers reassurturers as much as the elaborate booklets. They are after the doctor's treatment, starts a flirtation, which so enrages his wife that she plans to obtain release for her. The doctor is still held a prisoner in another part of the cave, and hastening to him she hastily tells him how he can effect the girl's rescue. "Tomorrow," she tells him, "you will be released. In some way you must mark the trail down which you are led blindfolded. Then it will be an easy matter to find the way here when you come with the sheriff. I will help you."

The next morning the physician is blindfolded and led out of the cave. But in his pocket he has loaded a quantity of small pills, which he carefully scatters along the winding crannies of the trail.

In the open the blind is removed and he is set free. An hour later he pulls up at the sheriff's office. After stating his business and how he has made it easy to effect the capture of Pinto and his gang, a posse is organized and sent out with the doctor as the guide.

The doctor and posse follow the pill-strewn path up the tortuous defile and easily capture the bad men. Alone, the doctor finds Marie, who expresses her deep gratefulness in a warm hand grasp and with tears in her eyes.

"PHARAOH; OR, ISRAEL IN EGYPT."—The latest Biblical subject put out by Messrs. Gaumont is called "Israel in Egypt." The film is 1,485 feet in length, and is beautifully colored throughout. The first scene shows Pharaoh surrounded by his court refusing to listen to the appeal of Moses for the liberation of the Israelites. Nestling close to the King of Egypt is his first-born child, and although the Prophet threatens to have all the first-born Egyptians smitten with death, Pharaoh hardens his heart and refuses the liberty of the Israelitish people. Then the plot thickens. A feast is prepared at which Moses attends, but before that the slaying of the lamb of the Passover is shown, and the sprinkling of the blood of the lamb over the lintel and door-posts is vividly pictured—the old buildings and the costuming of the participants in the ceremony being true to the period. The feast of the Passover follows, the Israelites being seated around a table, awaiting the coming of Moses. As he appears his people receive him reverently, and the lamb is brought in to be eaten with the unleavened bread which, in the form known to us as Passover cakes is handed to those present by the prophet.

The pictures depicting the tenth plague are finely conceived. First, we see the boy son of the King lying on a couch, attended by the women of the court, who amuse him by playing the harp and other instruments until he falls asleep. Pharaoh enters, and fondly kisses his first-born, enjoining the attendants to keep still that the boy may enjoy his sleep undisturbed. Suddenly, the lad awakes, as though seized with internal pains, and in a few seconds, after severe torture and writhing of the body, he is dead on his back, the victim of the threat uttered by Moses. Another deathbed scene is shown, of a lowly mill girl's son, and we see the herculean form of the father pushing two immense grindstones round, grinding corn, whilst the boy sleeps on the ground. The mother helps the father in pushing the stones round, when, with the same suddenness as was witnessed in Pharaoh's palace, the mysterious illness seizes the child, and the youngster, only about four years of age, gives a wonderful impersonation of the agony which might very well be real. Finally, he succumbs to the stroke, and then, in the hall of the Egyptian King's palace, we see the bereft parents bringing in their dead offspring to show to their equally bereaved sovereign, all cursing Moses and lamenting their loss.

Then, in the background, the Prophet and his followers appear, slowly walking down the centre of the enraged people, threatened at every step, but calm and serene in the power he has been the means of showing the Egyptians. Again he makes his appeal to the King for the release of the Israelites, and this time he is successful.

The final scene shows a street lined with the native inhabitants, eager and expectant, awaiting the exodus of the 400 years enslaved people. On come the Israelites, pleased to go, each with his goods and chattels, the family, sheep, camels and a thousand and one impedimenta. Six hundred thousand was the number who left, and the Gaumont film shows a fair percentage of them.

As a film, there is nothing to cavil at in Israel in Egypt. The pictures are clear, and the colors correct and distinguishable, without being harsh. The make-up of the actors and actresses shows the possession of a good stage manager, and we have every confidence in recommending this film as one of educational value, Biblical fact, and sound moral tone.

"NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S PRIDE."—"Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, having set up a golden image, commanded all the princes, governors, and all the populace, to gather together and worship the image."

"Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego refused to worship the image. In his rage and fury Nebuchadnezzar commanded them to be brought before him."

"Then Nebuchadnezzar commanded that they should heat the furnace and Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego were cast into it."

"And lo: No hair of their head was singed, for the Son of God was there, and the flames harmed them not."

"A WOMAN'S WIT."—When he decided to get married the bachelor of our story "overlooked a bet." He did not count on his landlady, who deeply desired to keep her guest.

Her strategy is successful, for by a series of practical and embarrassing tricks she manages to make him appear so ludicrous to his fiance that the latter lady finds another beau.

"A MOUNTAIN WIFE."—In the mountain wilds of Tennessee there is no end to the manufacture of moonshine whiskey. Whole families live on this nefarious trade and many of them die by it. The men who work at this business are constantly hunted by United States Revenue officers as violators of the law for manufacturing of liquor without a special license.

The "Mountain wife" loves her husband and stands by and shields him from his enemies, the officers; when they are on his track she hides him, then throws them off his trail, giving him time to escape in the mountain fastness, as we are shown in this interesting and thrilling picture.

The revenue men are hunting their man and meet an adventurous artist who joins them in the search. They come onto their quarry while he is busy at his still. He is seized and held at bay by the artist. A boy who is a friend of the moonshiner happens along and distracts the attention of the artist from the distiller, who, taking advantage of his chance, snatches the gun from the would-be hero, turns it on him and escapes to his home.

The detectives make a direct line to the moonshiner's home; his wife hears them and hides him in the cellar, hiding herself in the garret. The officers come, find no trace of their man and leave, all but the artist, who says he will stay and watch for the reappearance of the fugitive. He hides behind a barrel. The husband and wife come from their hiding places; the courageous artist confronts the husband with a pistol. "Hands up!" he says, but does not count on the wife who "swats" him in the face with a pillow; and again the hunted one gets possession of the pistol, gives it to his wife, and she holds the amateur detective in durance vile while her husband escapes to the mountain fastnesses.

Now she does something that requires pluck and determination—she makes the daring chap mount a horse and, straddling another, she compels him at the pistol's point to ride to the railroad station, embark and decamp for foreign parts a defeated and wiser man.

She returns to her home, sends word to her husband that the coast is clear and tells him to come back to the cabin to help pack up their belongings; that they will depart from the country and begin life anew.

The picture closes with an indescribable tableau of natural splendor, the escape of the man and his mountain wife to a place where they can work at an honest trade and live a good life free from offense to God and man.

"THE TAMING OF WILD BILL."—Bill never had felt the softening influence of love. He was a product of the days of '49 and he had stayed wild. He was about the wildest man in the Crazy Creek district, and that was going some. But there came a day when Bill tired of cooking his own grub and sewing on his own buttons, and he advertised his claim for sale. He was offered a pot of money by a Chicago investor and he could not know that the man was an arrant rogue who intended to swindle him out of the mine, so he traveled on a Pullman—where he had many strange adventures—and landed in the city by the lake. Innocently enough he left his papers with the agent, who promptly proceeded to forge duplicates, and the swindle would have gone through had not the office stenographer conceived an admiration for Bill and slipped him a warning. Then things happened in earnest, and Bill did not come out second best. He was so far first there was no second, so the mine agent took it out on the typist and fired her. But Bill was waiting downstairs for a chance to thank her, and when he found out what the trouble was he offered his heart, hand and gold mine, all three of which found favor in the eyes of the little shorthand expert. And so they were married and lived happily ever after with never a thought of Reno, but it sure was a shock

A Tale of a Hat

Tuesday, November 8th

Mistakes Will Happen and Appearances Are Deceiving. This Is a Comedy of Mistaken Identity Through a Hat Which Led a Man Into a Heap of Trouble. A Picture of Universal Smiles and a Good Laugh. Length, 954 feet.

"WHY, hubby, dear, here is an announcement of a special sale of hats." This remark is made by Mrs. Tipton at the breakfast table as she is looking over the morning's paper. Her hubby catches the significance of her comment, gives her some money and tells her to take advantage of the sale and buy herself a new headgear.

She goes to the sale, buys a perfect "dream," and when her husband comes home at night she shows him her purchase; he is delighted and compliments her on its becomingness.

A lady friend, Grace Welton, calls to see Mrs. Tipton the next day to announce her engagement to Hardy Fenton. Mrs. Tipton congratulates her friend and shows Grace her new hat. Grace is delighted with it and persuades her to let her wear it for the day while she keeps an appointment with her fiance. Mrs. Tipton generously loans the hat; and Grace, very much elated, goes to meet Fenton.

Mr. Tipton knows nothing about the loan of the hat and happens to see Grace, who resembles his wife very much, with his wife's hat and comes to the conclusion she is his wife. He tries to overtake her and is almost paralyzed with astonishment when he sees her meet a strange gentleman, walk away with him, enter an automobile and go away together. Mr. Tipton calls another auto and starts in pursuit. Grace and Hardy drive to a hotel, enter, order dinner and soon are enjoying a good feed and a pleasant tete-a-tete.

Mr. Tipton reaches the hotel, forces his way to the private dining-room where the engaged couple are eating and, without looking at Grace, begins to denounce her escort for meeting his wife and making a date with a married woman: "My wife. Scoundrel!" Hardy is insulted and resents the attack on himself and his intended. A scrimmage ensues and Tipton receives a knock-down and a black eye. When he rises he looks at Grace and then he wakes up. Explains that he was misled by the hat which is a duplicate of his wife's. Grace tells him about borrowing the hat from his wife. Matters are set aright and apologies follow.

They all go to Mr. Tipton's house where they are met by Mrs. Tipton who is grieved at her husband's bruised eye and accuses him of fighting. He explains how he got it and tells how her new hat got him into trouble and made him make a chump of himself. The laugh is on him and they all enjoy it at his expense.

Friday, November 11th

A Drama, Involving an Episode in the Mining Camps of California in 1845 and Another in the Civil War of 1861-'64. Length, 990 feet.

DURING the gold fever in California in "'49" and even as early as 1845, men were rough and reckless and among the number was Hammond Floyd, an adventurer, who was ready to turn a trick at cards, but always on the level. Engaged in a high stake game with Jenkins, a desperate dandy, who lived on his luck and record as a bad man, Hammond draws the winning cards and in short order cleans Jenkins and his gang out of their loose change and dust. They are sore at being beaten at their own game and determine to get his cash or do him up.

They waylay him, shoot him and are just about to rob him when Hank Garland, from the East, gets a drop on the desperadoes, rescues Hammond and takes him to his camp and nurses him back to health and strength. Hammond thinks the world of Hank, but the best of friends must part, and Hammond says goodbye to Hank. He tells him of his gratitude for all he has done for him, pulls a nine of diamonds from a pack of cards, tears it in half, gives one half to Hank and keeps the other himself, avowing should Hank need his assistance at any time he would never deny it on presentation of his half of the nine of diamonds.

Years later Hank Garland goes back East and engages in business. Hammond Floyd enlists in the Civil War in 1861; Garland's son is drafted in the Union service of that war, goes South and is sent on a dangerous commission into the Confederate lines. Strange as it may seem, "Ham" Floyd captures him and takes charge of the prisoner, who is sentenced to be shot as a spy. Floyd searches the boy, finds a wallet in which he discovers Hank Garland's half of the nine of diamonds. The boy tells him it was given to him by his father, who told him the story of it and said the half card might be of service to him some day.

Floyd tells the boy that he was his father's companion in California and gave the piece of card to his father, who had saved him from death; in return he would release his old friend's boy and allow him to escape. The boy gets away; Floyd, in the act of freeing the boy, is found out and is shot for his deed, and sacrifices his life for the son of the man who saved it in far-off California.

After the war the boy returns to his father, tells him how Floyd let him escape when he identified the half of the card. Hank Garland clasps his son to his breast and thanks God for the boy's deliverance.

Jean Goes Fishing

Saturday, November 12th

A Catchy and Bright Picture Play of a Day of Happenings; How Jean, the Wonderful Dog, Fishes and Does Other Things that Seem Almost Human and Makes Two Happy Souls One. Length, 988 feet.

"JEAN" is a sure enough wonderful dog, a good companion and friend, always ready to help his master whenever he can. It is not strange that Jack Crane, a young widower, takes the dog along with him and his little boy when they go fishing; Jack and his son start fishing; it is not long before the little fellow gets tired, passes his rod over to "Jean," who takes it in his mouth and continues where his young master left off.

See whose here's! Mrs. Gorden and her little daughter who are very much entertained by "Jean." While they are looking at the dog, the little girl drops her doll into the water and it floats out with the tide. "Jean" jumps into the water, rescues the doll and returns it to its owner.

Mrs. Gorden and her daughter thank Mr. Crane, and it is easily seen there is a mutual admiration.

Finding a shady nook in the woods, the lady and her little girl are comfortably seated, eating their lunch. Jack and his little boy begin to feel hungry and start for town to satisfy their appetites. They pass through the same path which Mrs. Gorden and her daughter have taken and suddenly come upon them. They ask Mr. Crane and son to join them. Jack and Jack, Jr., accept, make a happy picnic party and become good friends, and while the children run away to play Jack and Mrs. Gorden become quite confidential and sympathetic.

The children wander to the end of the pier, where they go to sail a little boat which Jack, Jr., has made, and thus occupied little Miss Gorden falls into the water and is carried beyond her depth. Little Jack jumps to the rescue and cries for help. Mrs. Gorden and Jack Crane hear the cries and start with "Jean" to the rescue. "Jean" reaches the end of the pier, plunges in and soon brings the children within reach of their parents and they are lifted to safety by Mr. Crane. The little girl is pretty well exhausted; she is carried home, and it is some time before she is herself again.

Jack, Jr., sends a basket of flowers to his young friend, engaging his faithful dog "Jean" as the bearer. Mr. Jack Crane and young Jack follow him to Mrs. Gorden's home.

The next and last scene shows Jack Crane and Mrs. Gorden standing in the moonlight, their youngsters not far distant, looking out upon the ocean; in the foreground "Jean" and a large black Dane are lying contentedly together. The whole scene suggests a happy union and a happy ending, and each one of the principals has made a pretty catch for one day's fishing.

"THE MYSTERY OF THE TORN NOTE."—When Mildred refused to marry Billy Sprague it was not so much because she did not love him as because Billy regarded it too much as a matter of course that one day they would be married. He said a tragic farewell like the handsome hero of melodrama, and to herself Mildred hoped that he would not do anything rash, for she loved Billy and intended to accept him about the twentieth time of asking. But love's young dream turned into a nightmare the next morning when the mail brought a note from Billy. There was a corner torn off, but there was plenty enough left, for the last words were, "I am going to drown my s——." It was not long before the police were called in and there ensued a lively chase along the river bank for traces of the suicide. Mildred was too excited to help much, and she identified any chance article of clothing as the property of the late lamented Billy, including the suit of a chap who was taking a quiet swim. Many other things happened that added to the liveliness of life until one of the policemen suggested that they go to where Billy used to live and see if he had left any more promising clues as to the exact point where he purposed shuffling off the mortal coil. The first person they met was William himself, who was rather surprised to see Mildred's escort. He produced the torn note. In it he said he was going to drown his sorrows in the flowing bowl. But he had not taken to drink so Mildred forgave him and the ring dented his pocketbook about $450.

"THE GAMBLER'S CHARM."—The professional gambler of the old-fashioned sort is a fast disappearing type in the West, but Kenyon was one of the best of the old school. He played cards better than he did anything else, and he played a square game, content to enjoy only the advantage that came with his expertness. He strikes out for new fields and comes takes Jim's seat when he drops from the game, his instant regard. In response to his request she brings him a drink of water and when he finds that she is fascinated by the tiny elephant on his watch guard he slips it off and makes her a present of it. Her father is a miner, but the lust of gaming is in his blood and he wastes his time at the saloon where there is a game always in progress. The gambler take's Jim's seat when he drops from the game, his funds exhausted, but presently Jim reappears, for he has taken the charm and offers this as his stake. Kenyon recognizes the charm and accuses Joe of having stolen it, not knowing that the child is his. There is an altercation in which Joe is wounded, and the gambler's distress is very genuine when he discovers the identity of the man. He goes to the house, where he meets a cold reception, but Joe takes the blame and the mother smilingly permits Kenyon to restore the charm to the little girl, giving him in exchange the baby's locket for luck. Joe braces up and so good luck went with the gambler's charm after all.

"THE LADY BARBERS."—Every hamlet can boast of one or more public hostelries and most of them find time to name one the Commercial, such is true of Caseyville. The evening train had just arrived, the hotel was busy attending to the wants of the new arrivals, among which was a real out and out lady tonsorial artist, who has made known her intention of opening a barber shop in the quiet and staid village. She is soon in the hands of the real estate man and a bargain struck for a location. The sign is placed in position and the excitement begins. The novelty of the occasion creates more furore than a detachment of hobble skirts at a church fair. The village beau brummels, married and unmarried, are in line awaiting their turn. The regular shop presents a grave aspect especially as regards the absence of customers. McGee drops in to tell the old reliable the cause of the sudden slump in business.

The news is not received by the ladies of the town with any degree of delight as they notice their husbands are spending more time and money at the barber shop than usual, some getting shaved two or three times a day. The new barber is so overwhelmed with business that she sends to the city for more help and in another day the force is increased to four barbers and a lady bootblack. The last arrival was too much—the village belles fairly fumed with rage and vowed vengeance. They hold an indignation meeting and resolve upon a plan. In the meantime the regular shop decides to enter into skirted tonsorial competition and accordingly enlists the services of his wife and hangs his sign out to herald the news, but he has not weighed the charms of the fair sex, and while the customers came—like the girl at the church—"turned right around and walked right out again." The suffragette committee by the time has perfected their defense and ordered the old regular to get busy and send for some young men as hair dressers. This is done and proves a bomb in the camp of the invading barbers, and all argument on the part of their men was of no avail. Their wives crowded to the old shop and the fair new arrivals are soon on their way, completing one of the best comedies of the season.

"THE BACHELOR."—This picture gives a chance to show how much can be told without words. It depicts a man who while busy with his morning toilet discovers he is a button short and the difficulties he has in fixing same.

"THE VAMPIRE."—A picture dramatization from Sir Ed Burne-Jones' famous painting, with suggestions from that world-famous poem by Rudyard Kipling—each conceded a peer in the literary and world of art. This great subject handles deftly the realms of the imaginary inner circle of society.

A fool there was and he made his prayer—
(Even as you and I)
To a rag and a bone and a hank of hair—
(We called her the woman who did not care)
But the fool called her his lady fair—
(Even as you and I)

Guy Temple, as "the fool there was," marries his brother's ward, his boyhood sweetheart, Emily. The young husband becomes ensnared in the toils of the Vampire (a destroyer of souls). Clandestine meetings are arranged and the cunning, unscrupulous, satanic actions of the Vampire compels the poor weakling Temple to falter and fall before her charms.

John Temple, the older brother, determines to save the young husband when he discovers his perfidy and to recover the jewels given the Vampire by Guy. In a dream he remembers where he had seen Loie before. She it was, who had ruined the life of Emily's father and rendered the then slip of a girl an orphan. Seeking out the brother, John Temple told him Loie was a Vampire, that she had ruined his own wife's father and to quit her under threat of his life. He offers Loie a large sum of money to leave America. But her promise is soon forgotten—her direful work continues, the tightening strands on reeking souls of mortals.

The fool was stripped to his foolish hide—
(Even as you and I).
Which she might have seen when she threw him aside—
(But it isn't on record the lady tried)
So some of him lived, but the most of him died—
(Even as you and I).

The young husband's mind is rent—his honor gone and the yawning abyss of the great beyond seeks its own.

"MAX IN A DILEMMA."—Max is in love with Kitty, who is willing, but whose father regards a substantial bank balance as of more importance than a loving heart. Max, rejected, returns to his chambers, and would like to die, but his courage fails him at the critical moment. He is interrupted in his reflections by a burglar. At the sight of Sykes, Max becomes inspired and offers him the sum of $500 to kill him before midnight. The thief agrees and departs. A new arrival now appears, who turns out to be a lawyer, who has called to inform Max that a large fortune has been left him by his uncle. Transported with joy, Max hastens to inform Kitty's father, and is, of course, immediately accepted, and invited to dinner. During dinner a servant announces that a visitor wishes to speak to Max. He goes to meet the newcomer, and is horrified to recognize Sykes, whose existence he had temporarily forgotten. With a cry he dashes out into the street, runs for dear life, is overtaken, and tremblingly awaits his death blow. Judge of his happiness and surprise when Sykes coolly hands him back his $500, saying at the same time that he is not going to risk his precious neck simply to do Max a favor.

"MICRO-CINEMATOGRAPHY RECURRENT FEVER."—By means of a combination of the microscope with the camera, this picture depicts the course of this virulent fever. In Russia, which has at times been visited by terrible epidemics of recurrent fever, the disease is caused by the bite of a flea that carries the disease, while in Africa it is the tick found in that country that transmits the disease. The picture is illustrated with observations of the blood of a monkey that has been inoculated. The germ soon multiplies, and innumerable bacilli can be discerned in a single drop of the blood under the microscope. The sickness comes in spells, between which the germ disappears and the animal seems cured, but the germ soon appears again in great numbers and after sev-

As time went on Mason's wife proved a shrew and the two gradually became estranged. In the mean time Mason found himself falling in love with one of his pupils. Recognizing his danger he sent the scholar to another teacher, his old friend George Bent. Later on returning to his home one night he found his wife had decamped with another man.

In the course of events Mason secured a divorce and went in search of his former pupil for whom he had a strong attachment which apparently would not down. Finally locating her he found that she was happily married to his old friend George Bent.

The many dramatic situations contained in this absorbing story are cleverly portrayed by the Kalem Players.

"A MEXICAN LEGEND."—It is noon at the old monastery of Vejas, which is situated in the heart of the wild country in northern Mexico and twelve miles from any habitation. The monks are returning from their labors in the garden to chapel. A band of Indians creep up through the long pampas grass, and as the monks come out from prayer, fall upon them and capture them. The aged Father Ignatius is dragged to the burial place and the heavy stone of a vault having been removed, is dropped inside, the stone lid being replaced. The others are imprisoned in the chapel while the Indians sack the monastery and make merry with the Fathers' well-stocked cellar. The aged Father prays before a painting of the Christ that is in the vault, and the figure comes to life, and leads him out of his living tomb. Father Ignatius sees the marauders dancing and debauching, and plods on his weary way to obtain assistance. He has to cross a river, and Christ appears and directs him to a floating island on which he is quickly borne to the other side. Weary and weak, he endeavors to climb the mountain path, but his strength gives out and he falls exhausted. Again Christ appears, takes him by the hand and leads him over the mountain. Finally he reaches his destination, a hacienda. He tells his story and the Mexican boys are soon in their saddles and on their way to the monastery. They swim the lake on horseback, and arriving at the monastery it is but the work of a few minutes to put the Indians to rout and release the imprisoned monks. Reverently they all turn and fall on their knees and give thanks to Him who gave the holy Father strength to obtain the help that was so badly needed.

"BLACK HEART."—Rob Rokers is in prison. He is a noted vagabond and has no chance of escape from the death sentence he deserves. An arrow is shot into his cell bearing a file and a note. This informs him that his companions have formed themselves into a brotherhood for the purpose of revenging themselves upon their enemy, the chief of the police. He is in love with a gypsy girl, Sperata, and the brotherhood have decided that Rob Rokers shall carry her off as the price of his freedom. Rob eagerly snatches at this chance of freedom. He files the bars and escapes undetected. Then, disguised as a beggar, he follows Sperata on her way home and rushes in and carries her off. Her brother sees him and rushes to the chief of the police for help. He requires no urging, and summoning his men he is soon in pursuit through the narrow and badly paved streets. Rokers is captured and Sperata rescued. The chief of the police is now more bitter than ever against Rokers, and determines to mete out justice himself. Before a tribunal of masked figures Rokers is forced to give an account of himself. He is finally condemned to death by the judge, who unmasks and shows himself to be the chief of the police.

"DUTCH TYPES."—Dutch girls and women with their dainty white caps and gold ornaments smile at us from the screen, and Volendam fishermen, their hands deep in the pockets of their baggy trousers, are to be seen stolidly gazing across the emerald green pastures of Holland. Here and there a windmill may be discerned, and tiny little Dutch girls toddling along in their voluminous skirts form a pretty picture.

"A GAMBLER'S END."—Herbert Ralston was a gambler and ne'er-do-well. The picture opens in the parlor of his home in Pennsylvania, where his wife is seen making baby clothes. Ralston soon comes in, and having lost his money gambling, begins to quarrel with his wife. He takes his grip and leaves the house. Along the road he discovers a dead man lying on the edge of the woods who resembles him so much that it even makes the hardened man of the world start. He changes clothes with him and proceeds on his way. The body is found and identified by Mrs. Ralston as her husband. Two months later we see her alone in her home with her fatherless babe. Four years elapse. Mrs. Ralston has married a Dakota ranchman, John Westmere, and they are living on the ranch. It is the child's bedtime, and she opens the locket round the child's neck and shows her the picture of her father. She teaches her to pray for him. Ralston is still gambling, and is now a faro dealer in a saloon out in Dakota. He kills a cowboy who accused him of cheating and makes his escape. He is quickly pursued by others present and an exciting chase ensues. Soon Ralston, to put his pursuers off the trail, dismounts and, striking his horse on the flanks, lets it continue on while he himself takes to the woods ,and arriving at Westmere's ranch, walks quietly in. As he does so the child, who has slipped from the lap of her sleeping mother, toddles in and, looking at him dumbfounded, leads him to a chair and kisses him. She recognizes him as her father, and shows him the portrait of her mother. Ralston understands. It is his child. Westmere comes in and Ralston explains. Westmere starts towards the bedroom as if to call his wife, but Ralston motions that she must never know. He hears the horses of his pursuers outside. He says good-bye to the child, opens the door and falls dead, riddled by the bullets of the friends of the cowboy he had shot.

"A TALE OF A HAT."—"Why, hubby, dear, here is an announcement of a special sale of hats." This remark is made by Mrs. Tipton at the breakfast table as she is looking over the morning's paper. Her hubby catches the significance of her comment, gives her some money and tells her to take advantage of the sale and buy herself a new headgear.

She goes to the sale, buys a perfect "dream," and when her husband comes home at night she shows him her purchase; he is delighted and compliments her on its becomingness.

A lady friend, Grace Welton, calls to see Mrs. Tipton the next day to announce her engagement to Hardy Fenton. Mrs. Tipton congratulates her friend and shows Grace her new hat. Grace is delighted with it and persuades her to let her wear it for the day while she keeps an appointment with her fiance. Mrs. Tipton generously loans the hat; and Grace, very much elated, goes to meet Fenton.

Mr. Tipton knows nothing about the loan of the hat and happens to see Grace, who resembles his wife very much, with his wife's hat and comes to the conclusion she is his wife. He tries to overtake her and is almost paralyzed with astonishment when he sees her meet a strange gentleman, walk away with him, enter an automobile and go away together. Mr. Tipton calls another auto and starts in pursuit. Grace and Hardy drive to a hotel, enter, order dinner and are soon enjoying a good feed and a pleasant tete-a-tete.

Mr. Tipton reaches the hotel, forces his way to the private dining-room where the engaged couple are eating and, without looking at Grace, begins to denounce her escort for meeting his wife and making a date with a married woman: "My wife, scoundrel!" Hardy is insulted and resents the attack on himself and his intended. A scrimmage ensues and Tipton receives a knock-down and a black eye. When he rises he looks at Grace and then he wakes up. Explains that he was misled by the hat, which is a duplicate of his wife's. Grace tells him about borrowing the hat from his wife. Matters are set right and apologies follow.

They all go to Mr. Tipton's house, where they are met by Mrs. Tipton, who is grieved at her husband's bruised eye and accuses him of fighting. He explains how he got it and tells how her new hat got him into trouble and made him make a chump of himself. The laugh is on him and they all enjoy it at his expense.

"THE NINE OF DIAMONDS."—During the gold fever in California in "'49," and even as early as 1845, men were rough and reckless and among the number was Hammond Floyd, an adventurer, who was ready to turn a trick at cards, but always on the level. Engaged in a high stake game with Jenkins, a desperate dandy, who lived on his luck and record as a bad man, Hammond draws the winning cards and in short order cleans Jenkins and his gang out of their loose change and dust. They are sore at being beaten at their own game and determine to get his cash or do him up.

They waylay him, shoot him and are just about to rob him when Hank Garland, from the East, gets the drop on the desperadoes, rescues Hammond and takes him to his camp and nurses him back to health and strength. Hammond thinks the world of Hank, but the best of friends must part, and Hammond says good-bye to Hank. He tells him of his gratitude for all he has done for him, pulls a nine of diamonds from a pack of cards, tears it in half, gives one half to Hank and keeps the other himself, avowing should Hank need his assistance at any time he would never deny it on the presentation of his half of the nine of diamonds.

THE FUGITIVE

Showing the Extreme of a Mother's Tenderness.

There has never been produced in motion pictures a more powerfully dramatic episode than the one incorporated in this Biograph story. It is an incident of the Civil War, and a party of Union soldiers are surprised by a corps of Confederates. One of the Union forces becomes separated from the others and is pursued by one of the Confederates, whom he turns on and kills. Later, he seeks shelter of the mother of the slain boy, each ignorant of the facts. When she learns the truth she is at first inclined to give him up, but the mother's tenderness asserts itself, and thinking of a mother awaiting her son, aids him to escape.

Simple Charity

Showing the Difference Between the Ostentatious and the Sincere.

Real charity is rare, for what is often dispensed as charity has a selfish motive behind it. In this Biograph subject we draw the line finely between the two phases. An aged couple are dying from want, and while the Public Charity Society is investigating the case as to its worthiness, a poor little slavey of the apartment house pawns her best clothing to help, which, of course, is meager. The Society, however, after a rigorous investigation, arrive with aid, only to find the poor old man dead and his wife nearly so. Approximate length, 993 feet.

Years after Hank Garland goes back east and engages in business. Hammond Floyd enlists in the Civil War in 1861; Garland's son is drafted in the Union service of that war, goes South and is sent on a dangerous commission into the Confederate lines. Strange as it may seem, "Ham" Floyd captures him and takes charge of the prisoner, who is sentenced to be shot as a spy. Floyd searches the boy, finds a wallet in which he discovers Hank Garland's half of the nine of diamonds. The boy tells him it was given to him by his father, who told him the story of it and said the half card might be of service to him some day.

Floyd tells the boy that he was his father's companion in California and gave the piece of card to his father, who had saved him from death; in return he would release his old friend's boy and allow him to escape. The boy gets away; Floyd, in the act of freeing the boy, is found out and is shot for his deed, and sacrifices his life for the son of the man who saved it in far-off California.

After the war the boy returns to his father, tells him how Floyd let him escape when he identified the half of the card. Hank Garland clasps his son to his breast and thanks God for the boy's deliverance.

"JEAN GOES FISHING."—"Jean" is a sure enough wonderful dog, a good companion and friend, always ready to help his master whenever he can. It is not strange that Jack Crane, a young widower, takes the dog along with him and his little boy when they go fishing. Jack and his son start fishing; it is not long before the little fellow gets tired and passes his rod over to "Jean," who takes it in his mouth and continues where his young master left off.

See who's here! Mrs. Gorden and her little daughter, who are very much entertained by "Jean." While they are looking at the dog, the little girl drops her doll into the water and it floats out with the tide. "Jean" jumps into the water, rescues the doll and returns it to its owner.

Mrs. Gorden and her daughter thank Mr. Crane, and it is easily seen there is a mutual admiration for each other.

Finding a shady nook in the woods, the lady and her little girl are comfortably seated, eating their lunch. Jack and his little boy begin to feel hungry and start for town to satisfy their appetites. They pass through the same path which Mrs. Gorden and her daughter have taken and suddenly come upon them. They ask Mr. Crane and his son to join them. Jack and Jack, Jr., accept, soon make a happy picnic party and become good friends, while the children run away to play Jack and Mrs. Gorden become quite confidential and sympathetic.

The children wander to the end of the pier, where they go to sail a little boat which Jack, Jr., has made, and while thus occupied little Miss Gorden falls into the water and is carried beyond her depth. Little Jack jumps to the rescue and cries for help. Mrs. Gorden and Jack Crane hear the cries and start with "Jean" toward the children's voices. "Jean" reaches the end of the pier, plunges in and soon brings the children within reach of their parents and they are lifted to safety by Mr. Crane. The little girl is pretty well exhausted; she is carried home, and it is some time before she is herself again.

Jack, Jr., sends a basket of flowers to his young friend, engaging his faithful dog "Jean" as the bearer. He walks triumphantly ahead and Mr. Jack Crane and young Jack follow him to Mrs. Gorden's home.

The next and last scene shows Jack Crane and Mrs. Gorden standing in the moonlight, their youngsters not far distant, looking out upon the ocean; in the foreground "Jean" and a large black Dane are lying contentedly together. The whole scene suggests a happy union and a happy ending, and each one of the principals have made a pretty catch for one day's fishing.

"THE FUGITIVE."—The strength of a mother's love will never be fully appreciated. What anxiety does she not suffer for her own; what self-sacrifice does she not endure, yet, withal, she is reasonable and considerate to a marvelous extent. The Civil War has just begun and the young men of the Virginia mountains are experiencing that great sting of war—the good-bye to mothers and sweethearts. The scene of our story is Virginia in a locality where the feelings of the people are about evenly divided. John, the Confederate, is taking leave of his mother to join the little regiment of the neighborhood volunteers. Off the band of patriots go to headquarters. Not very far away we see John, the Union soldier, bidding farewell to his mother and sweetheart, on his departure for the front. The two forces happen to be close to each other, and when John, of the Union forces, with comrades, goes foraging, they are surprised by John, the Confederate, and put to flight. The Union boy becomes separated from his companions and is hotly pursued by the Confederate. Driven to the "last ditch," the Federal turns and fires at the oncoming Confederate, who drops in his tracks. This enables the Union boy to get away, and rushing up to a farmhouse, which is indeed the home of the Confederate, dashes in and seeks protection of the mother of the boy he has slain. Neither of them, however, realized the enormity of this plea. The mother hides the fugitive behind the fireplace board, and as the soldiers later bring on the body of her dear boy, she realizes what the death of the fugitive would mean to his mother, so she is determined to save him, she, of course, not knowing that he was responsible for the death of her son. Later, however, when she learns the facts and the fugitive's identity, she is at first inclined to give him up, but when calm reason takes possession of her, her mother instinct predominates and she thinks of another mother awaiting her son's return, so she enables him to escape by the back way out of the house, the Confederate soldiers having departed, they reasoning that the mother would not shield the destroyer of her son's life if he was anywhere about. After the war, when wounds are healed, two mothers are seen, one welcoming her hero son as one of victory's band, while the other decorates with flowers the coat of the gallant boy who fought and died for the lost cause.

"SIMPLE CHARITY."—"And the greatest of these is Charity." Charity, that much abused word. How often do we find real charity? Only among those poor souls who can ill afford to dispense it. Most times charity is bestowed with great ostentation and a fanfare of trumpets—we say charity, but it is only so-called charity. Humility is the father of real charity, whereas, upon most occasions charity is bestowed that the bestower may be glorified. An illustration of this is portrayed in this Biograph subject. In an East Side tenement there lived an old couple. The husband was a cigar maker, but becoming feeble from age, he is discharged. Back to his cheerless home he comes, where his faithful wife tries to buoy up his spirits. The old man realizes, however, that he has lived out his usefulness and appreciates the reality of a future of absolute want, short though it may be. The awful aspect quite undoes him, and he is taken seriously ill. It is indeed a house of sorrow. No money with which to buy food or medicine, the poor couple resort to pawnships to raise a little money on their household effects, they both being too proud to ask aid from anyone, and there were those in the house who would have been glad to do it. There is a young settlement doctor who administers to the wants of the infirm, but he is kept in ignorance of this case, so the old man goes unattended. A pretty little slavey, who works about the house is the first one to know of the poor couple's sad plight. She in her innocent way has fallen desperately in love with the young doctor, who, through meeting her often as he comes and goes, is quite unaware of the interest he has excited. The sincere girl decks herself out in her best dress hoping to fascinate him, but sad to relate, he doesn't notice it. While thus attired she hears the sorrowing of the poor woman, and is moved to a determination to help, but how? She has nothing to spare herself. An idea! And though it hurts her she takes to the pawnship this one best dress and raises fifty cents on it which she forces the poor woman to take. This is real charity. At length, when her husband is sinking slowly, the poor woman rushes to the City Charity Society. Here we find the red tape of charity. They must make rigid investigation for fear they may give aid to the unworthy. Well, by the time they get through their innvestigation, the poor man is dead. At this moment the young doctor just hears of the case, and learns through finding the pawn-ticket the slavey drops, what a jewel in the rough she is, as contrasted with the other women of the Charity Society. Consequently, the girl has made a stronger though mute appeal to him than did her efforts when togged out in her finery.

"A TRIP OVER THE ROCKY AND SELKIRK MOUNTAINS IN CANADA."—When you see this beautiful scenic picture through the Canadian Rockies, there is liable to be a great big longing in your heart, "I wish I could go there." The camera has done its work well and painted in black and white upon the canvas the grandeur and beauty of the world old Rockies. Even minus the riot of color that abounds there, minus the blue of the sky, the green of the lakes, the sunshine which gilds the peaks and pinnacles, the glories of the foliage and the wonderful colors of the rocks with all their infinite varieties minus all these, still we are deeply impressed with the lavish beauty of the Rockies.

We start upon our trip over the C. P. R. at Calgary, a beautiful city which stands sentinel on the watch line between mountain and prairie. Soon we find ourselves fairly among the mountains, with all their grandeur, tunnels, torrents and towering peaks. A few moments' stop at Leggan, a glimpse at Lake Louise, the beauty spot of America, then down Fraser Canyon and the Selkirk Mountains. A visit to the National Park, the buffalo, the antelopes and so on until we have passed the two great steamers, the Princess Charlotte and the Princess Vicoria, off Otto Point on their way to Victoria, the capital of British Columbia, and there we pause to view the harbor, the parliamentary building and the city itself. Four hundred and twenty-five feet of beauty and every picture is a gem in itself.

"THE SHIP'S HUSBAND."—In this age of divorce and matrimony, affinities and alimony, one could hardly expect that a ship would have a husband, but it is true, she has, even dear old Daniel Webster says so. The ship's husband is an agent who has charge of a ship in port. Well, that's a great deal more than some men have with their wives at home. But the point is, who is the ship's husband in this particular case and had Mrs. James A. Knox known that the ship had a husband there never would have been such a complication as this delightful little comedy affords to the spectators.

Mrs. Knox loves her husband, James Knox, and Clara Jones dearly loves her husband, Henry Jones, and it might be well to add that both husbands love their dear little wives, but the "Charmer," ah! there's where the trouble lies, who is the "charmer"? Mrs. Knox discovers a hair that is foreign to her own pretty head upon Mr. Knox's coat, conveniently placed there by a practical joker and a telegram to the effect that her husband is to sail with the "Charmer" at ten and that he need not meet her husband Jones. The green eyed monster at once proceeds to grow larger and larger and she rushes down to the boat, but it is far out to sea. She immediately proceeds to inform Mr. Jones that his wife has eloped with her husband. This sets Jones in a whirl and he at once hires a tug with Mrs. Knox at his heels, they sail away to capture the villain Knox and his supposed unfaithful wife, Mrs. Jones. But ere this has all transpired Mrs. Jones, who has all the time been safely on shore, discovers her husband, Jones, running away on a tug with Mrs. Knox. She at once sends Mr. Knox a wireless to the effect that Mr. Jones has run away with his wife, Mrs. Knox, and the mistakes pile upon mistakes until the four curious people arrive at the ship's husband5s office and the mystery is all cleared up. The "Charmer" is the name of the boat that Knox sailed away on and the husband is none other than Mr. Jones himself.

has a four-year-old son, whose care is somewhat of a burden to him, Martin not being a very affectionate parent. One day when he is searching for paying dirt, he leaves his little boy, nicknamed "Nodsawana" by the Indians, who are camped about the mountain, with an old squaw at the Indian camp, to care for him for two days. Martin does not return for the child at the time specified. Meanwhile, Sandy Smith, our friend whom we saw as "Sandy the Substitute," comes along one day and inquires of the Indians how to get over that part of the mountain range. Sandy notices the white boy among all the Indian children and inquires where the child came from. He is informed that the father left the child to be back in a day or two, but has not come. Sandy offers to take the child and care for him and the Indians quickly consent when Sandy presents them with a new bandana handkerchief and a match box. It is useless to try to describe the complete action of this film. Enough to say that Sandy and the little tot, whose care he has assumed, take to each other from the first. Sandy presents him with a pup and the child and the pup and the big miner hold our interest for several scenes. Finally, one day, Martin, the father of the boy, comes to the Indian camp and inquires for the son. Fear seizes the old squaw as she tells him what has happened. Martin immediately rides to Sandy's camp by the Norfolks and claims the boy. Sandy does not know him and refuses, as the child in fear of Martin, clutches Sandy about the knees. A ride to the Indian camp ensues and the old squaw tells Sandy that Martin is the father of the child. Sandy is forced, of course, to acknowledge the right of the parent and reluctantly passes little Nodsawana to his father. The boy holds out his arms for the pup which he has been carrying and the father objects to letting him have it. At this point, Sandy asserts himself and makes the father let the little fellow take the dumb companion which he gave him and threatens him with all kinds of things if he does not let him keep the pup. Sandy now goes home and all is loneliness. The little bright tot whose chatter entertained him and opened up a new life and a new channel in which he could spend the richness of his claim has gone. A few days later Sandy is passing the camp of Martin when he sees him about to abuse the boy. A struggle ensues and Martin, in a surly way, tells Sandy that if he is so interested in the kid, he can buy him. Sandy is quick to strike a bargain. The consideration is Sandy's claim at Norfolk and the exchange is made. We are next shown the big man triumphantly mounted on his pack horse with the little boy, who is hugging the pup which Sandy had given him and trailing along towards new fields and their future, which seems bright for the little smiling urchin and the great big hearted miner who leads him forth to his destiny.

Sandy has founded a new home for the little one, whose tiny fingers have played so deeply with his heart chords when a stranger arrives one night with a letter from the cheriff bearing the news of the boy's father's death in a gambling row and that the mine reverts to the child. Sandy realizes that the boy's future lies in his hands and we are shown a very touching scene at the close of the picture when the great rough miner is trying to teach the little fatherless boy the Lord's prayer.

A beautiful picture full of the interest which follows the child, full of the heart touch so hard to attain, complete with beautiful scenery and perfect in action in all of the characters, none the least in that of the little four-year-old tot, played by a child of just that age. Even the pup is worthy of a passing mention. Nodsawana will go down in moving picture history as a hit.

"THE LASSIE'S BIRTHDAY."—This is another of those fresh, buoyant, delightful light comedies for which the Edison Company has lately become noted. The entire scenes take place in a garden back of a summer house and show the birthday morning of a charming lass and the various presents brought by the various suitors for her treasure. The lass herself is not up when the story begins and the first to appear are two children, who scamper off in search of suitable gifts for her, looking up and laughing at the closed blinds which show that she is still asleep upon her natal day. And then comes a poor but attractive young man, who, having nothing in his pockets wherewith to purchase presents, has gotten up betimes and picked violets for his lady, which he leaves upon a table just outside the little summer house. Of course, he writes a little note upon a piece of wood and leaves it with them. He has hardly gone when a poetic youth, a very poetic fellow appears. He is evidently fond of himself as well as the girl ,for he brings her a portrait, probably painted by his own hand and verses to his mistress's eyebrow, probably. He looks scornfully at the violets and puts his portrait in front of them on the table with his scroll of verses by it. Then, deciding to watch the reception of his gift, he hides beside the porch, but he has hardly done so when a roly-poly youth, who is fond of good living, appears with a box of candy and a love note for the lassie. He looks over the two presents which have preceded his and smiles at the thought that anyone should care more for anything than good things to eat. He, too, decides to watch the reception of his gift and climbs upon the summer house from which point of vantage he can see all that passes below. Of course, he is discovered by the poetic fellow, who does not see him at first. And then comes a young man, evidently of a business frame of mind, for he looks at his watch and hurries in. He must have money, for he produces a ring from his pocket, which he confidently placed in front of all the other gifts on the table on top of his own business card. Then he, too, hides him behind an old tree on one side of the garden to watch the maiden's rejection of all the other gifts but his. She comes and does not see the gifts at all at first, but seems to be looking for someone who is not there and we guess that it is perhaps the poor young man who brought the violets, but he is not visible. The youngsters come with baskets of flowers and fruit and then she realizes that the birthday gifts have begun to appear, she looks at the table and begins an examination of her presents. The ring comes first and with it she is delighted until she sees who sent it and then she rejects it scornfully. The business man's face is a study as she first praises and then disregards his present. Then comes the box of candy, which looks delicious and she is pleased until she reads the love that accompanies it and then the fat boy nearly falls off the summer house in his dejection and also in his anger at the fact that the other two lovers are delighted and openly show their happiness at his downfall in the lady's estimation. The poet is next and his gift is turned to ridicule by the fact that when she picks up his portrait, she picks it up wrong side up and the ends of his necktie so much resemble donkey's ears that the whole thing is turned into a farce. Tearing his hair and vowing vengeance upon his rivals, he leaves the garden in a high dudgeon. Then she finds the violets and they are the only things that seem to mean very much to her. Of course, the young man himself happens to come back in time to see the reception of this gift and as he and she come together in love's embrace, the fat boy slips from his perch and dangles helplessly from the summer house while a little girl of six holds up her apron and tries to catch him, lest he fall.

KALEM CO.

"FOR A WOMAN'S HONOR."—Miss Alice Joyce, leading lady of the Kalem Company's northern stock company, plays the heroine in an exceptionally fine romantic comedy drama announced for Wednesday, Nov. 9. The new production is called "For a Woman's Honor," and it deals with that exciting and interesting period in Virginia which directly preceded the war. The story is that of a young Southern lawyer who has incurred the enmity of the father of the girl he hopes to marry by besting the old gentleman in a lawsuit. The young folks decide to override the parental authority by eloping and their plans are apparently working out excellently when an unforeseen incident changes the aspect of things entirely. It appears that the miller's wife, an old lady of some means, had met with a serious mishap during the evening and had fallen from the door steps where she was discovered by a shiftless negro who had happened by. The negro at first had gone to the old lady's aid, but when he saw the contents of the handbag at her side his cupidity overcame his better feelings and he took the money and decamped. Shortly after the young elopers happened to ride by and seeing the woman in dire straits they dismounted from their horses and went to her assistance. The young man used his handkerchief to staunch a wound in the old lady's head and left it behind when he rode on with the girl. During this period, however, the young lady had an opportunity to reflect and decide that she wanted to go back home. The lover gallantly acquiesced and she was able to get back into the house without being seen. The next morning the old lady was found dead by the roadside and naturally the accusing finger was pointed at the young hero and in order to protect the honor of his sweetheart, refused to explain his doings of the night before and only at the final trial, when the young man seemed in jeopardy of his life did the girl summon up sufficient courage to tell the truth. She did this in the courtroom and of course under the circmstances the escapade was forgiven and the lovers united.

In dramatic work, costuming and scenic environment this is one of the best pictures of the Kalem series.

"THE ATTACK ON FORT RIDGELY."—The Kalem Indian release for Friday, No. 11, is called "The Attack on Fort Ridgely," and follows the story of that noted engagement without essential variation.

Fort Ridgely was a frontier post in northern Minnesota and upon the edge of the country infested by hostile Sioux lead by Little Crow. At the time when the whites had little reason to suspect an outbreak Little Crow formed a big war party and before troops could be organized and dispatched to the front had massacred hundreds of men, women and children. Fort Ridgely itself was saved through the goodness of Other Day, a friendly Indian girl, who informed Capt. McPhail of the uprising and plans of the attack on the fort, thus enabling the little band of soldiers to put up one of the most remarkable defenses known in the history of early Indian warfare.

The Kalem players have reproduced the story substantially as it was set down by Capt. Humphreeville's Indian classic, "Twenty Years Among Our Hostile Indians."

E. L. Kuykendall, proprietor Dixie Theatre, Columbus, Miss., in sending his subscription to The Film Index, says: "I find it very valuable in every way in keeping tabs on release dates of film subjects and songs. I also wish to speak a word of praise for the "Electrical Talk," by Mr. Hallberg, which has helped me not a little. This alone is worth the subscription price and more. Keep the good work going.

Among the visitors at the Vitagraph Studios this past week were Professors Arnold, Burnham and Bryant of the class of physics and applied sciences of the Erasmus High School. The gentlemen are greatly interested in the making and the importance of motion pictures from an educational standpoint and very enthusiastic over the vitagraph "Life Portrayals."

Nelt Waters is proprietor of The Lyric Theatre, Corry, Pa., which is said to be one of the coziest picture houses in northwestern Pennsylvania. It seats 200 persons; is equipped throughout with the latest devices for safety, and only licensed pictures are shown. Mr. Waters ran the Johnson-Jeffries pictures at his house to an attendance of 1,900 people. He says that nearly 300 women attended the afternoon shows.

posts, ruined buildings and deserted newspaper offices are also witnesses to the hail of iron that swept in from the sea.

The first scenes of the film show Lisbon as it was a short time ago, when Manuel held the sceptre, and afford fine views of the principal streets and buildings and a beautiful panoramic glimpse of the harbor. King Manuel, too, is seen, and regiments of soldiers pass in parade.

In the first part are also scenes showing Manuel's visit to England last year, including his welcomes at Portsmouth and London. As an additional interesting item, the view of King Manuel and eight other kings at King Edward's funeral is furnished.

The whole film is brimful of interest and will doubtless be eagerly viewed in America, as the later views are striking illustrations of the newspaper accounts of the deposition of the Portuguese boy monarch. This film is about 727 feet and on the same reel is a short subject, about 283 feet, entitled "Spanish Loyalty."

A Progressive Lima Exhibitor.

G. O. Dupuis, owner and manager of the Royal theatre in Lima, O., is one of those enterprising and intelligent exhibitors who does not rest contented merely with the successful and clean management of his own picture house. He aims at the general progress and upward trend of the motion picture, and in articles which he contributes from time to time to his home papers he keeps his fellow townspeople posted on the picture industry.

In a recent article, which appeared in the Lima "Republican," and which occupied several columns, Mr. Dupuis showed how motion pictures have become historical fixtures.

Chicago Film Brevities.

I called on Manager VanRonkel, of the General Film Co., at 77 S. Clark St., Monday, Oct. 31, and he informed me that he had taken on 13 new customers on that date.

M. D. Schafer, manager of the Royal theatre, LaSalle, Ill., was in the city last week, arranging for "Abraham Lincoln's Clemency," and other films. Manager Schafer is a versatile genius, and, in addition to doing his own singing in character costumes, has written some clever sketches, which have been produced at his house with great success. One of these, "The Election Bet," made a special hit recently. The Royal has a fine 4-piece orchestra, and the auditorium is well lighted while the pictures are run off.

I ran across Charles Abram and Joseph Abram, owners of the Acorn theatre, 3410 Ogden avenue, one day last week. They have just dispensed with vaudeville and have installed a service that includes a first run daily. The General Film Co., at 77 S. Clark St., attends to their booking. They state that business is excellent.

I had the pleasure of seeing Pathe's fine American subject, "Abraham Lincoln's Clemency," run off in the Pathe Chicago office the other day. This is a truly magnificent film, and is bound to become historic. Already so many prints have been ordered throughout the country that many additional prints will have to be made at the factory in New Jersey. Exhibitors are fairly falling over one another to get the first run of this film. It will be released Saturday, Nov. 5.

Tom Quill, who is making a big success in getting out posters for some of the leading licensed manufacturers, tells me that for some time he has been careful to eliminate the pictures of deadly weapons or scenes showing violation of law in the Litho. work done by him.

S. E. Kinkead, cashier of the K. O. Co., returned from a belated Summer vacation last week. He spent most of the time at Charleston, Ill., visiting a brother.

H. Smith, formerly owner of the Star theatre, Beloit, Wis., purchased the Grand theatre, on Milwaukee and Western avenues, this city, Friday, Oct. 28. He will run nothing but pictures in the Grand.

The Alcazar, on "Picture Row," East Madison street, this city, is standing loyally by pictures and is the only paying house on the "Row" at the present time. It is packed to the doors at every performance, and Manager Andy Talbot smiles and says, "Motion pictures are good enough for me." The owner, Mr. Seever, echoes the same remark.

Martin May, owner and manager of the Orpheum, Kenosha, Wis., visited the General Film Co. at 85 Dearborn street, last week. He reports fair business.

Charles Oakley, the enterprising young manager of the Crystal and Colonial theatres, at Bedford, Ind., was a visitor last week. He came into book up both his houses with the General Film Co. at 85 Dearborn street. Mr. Oakley said that both houses are doing fine business.

"The Edengraph is doing fine work and is the real picture machine, having no bad features and so many good ones that I do not hesitate to say it is the best machine on the market," is the unsolicited tribute written to the Kleine Optical Co. recently by Dr. Charles Lyndon, a traveling lecturer, who uses motion pictures as illustrations. The quotation given above was the postscript to a letter containing an order for goods from the K. O. Co. supply department.

NEW DEVICE FOR OPERATOR'S CONVENIENCE.

The Charles L. Kiewert Co. has just placed upon the market a simple, little device that will be instantly appreciated by every operator. It is called the Bio Arc Screen, and is intented for attachment to the lamp house door in such a way as to show a full size, accurate reproduction of the arc outside the lamp house. The device is small and compact and may be attached to any lamp house door in two or three minutes and will not interfere in the least with the ordinary operation of the machine.

The image of the arc is an exact reproduction, but sufficiently subdued so as to occasion no discomfort to the eye in looking at it. The outlines of every portion of the arc are clear and distinct and in this respect it is far superior to the ruby-glass-covered peephole ordinarily used. The latter shows only those portions of the arc which contain red rays, and naturally the form of the arc itself, which contains practically no red rays, is not shown at all. As the shape of the arc, that is the bluish flame between the carbon tips, is of the utmost importance in judging of the condition of the light, the necessity of this device will be at once appreciated.

It has the further advantage that the image of the arc is visible from the operators' usual position, and it is not necessary for him to move to a position in which he can see through the peephole in order to know how his light is working. Furthermore, his eye is subjected to no strain whatever, and he may quickly shift his glance from the arc image to his picture without the temporary blindness which always follows taking the eye from a powerful source of light to a weaker.

This device has been thoroughly tried out in practice before being placed on the market, the Charles L. Kiewert Co. having placed models in the hands of its salesmen for this purpose, and they state that every operator who saw the device immediately expressed a wish to purchase it.

In order that every operator may be able to satisfy himself as to the value and advantages of this device, the manufacturers are offering to refund the purchase price in every case where it fails to give satisfactory results, so that no operator need hesitate for fear of spending his money without receiving an adequate return.

Testing License Law.

In order to test the constitutionality of the law requiring the owners of photoplay theatres of Baltimore to take out licenses to run their houses, Frank Ebert, manager of a photoplay theatre on North Howard street, appeared before Justice Loden, Oct. 28, in the West District Police Court, charged with conducting his show without a license. Attorney J. Wallace Bryan appeared for Mr. Ebert, and after the only witness for the state, Detective Armstrong, had testified that he had caused Mr. Ebert's arrest on the above charge, Mr. Ebert's attorney requested to release the defendant on his own recognizance until a further hearing could be arranged by the court. The request was granted.

Mr. Bryan filed a demurrer in which he claimed the law requiring the licensing of picture shows was unconstitutional. The case will be argued before Judge Harland, of the Superior Court of Baltimore. It is said this will be a test case and all picture men are much interested in its outcome.

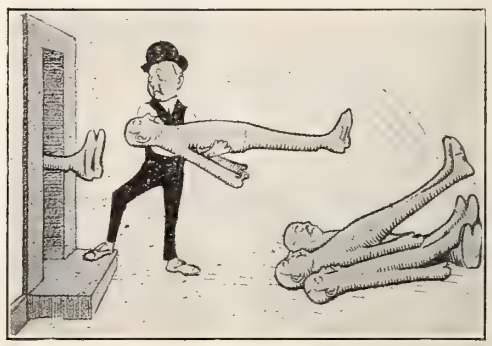
"Throwing Out the Dead Ones"



CHARACTERS:
Chas. Guilloid, Prop. Palace Theatre, Hoboken, N. J.
J. H. Hallberg, Inventor Economizer.
Scene: Hallberg's Office. Enter Mr. Guilloid.

Mr. G.: "Good morning. I have heard so much about your Economizer, I would like to know what you charge for one, and your guarantee."

Mr. H.: "I will save 2-3 on your current bill and produce 100% better light than you can get with a rheostat; the price is $100."

Mr. G.: "Well, I will let you know shortly."

January, 1910.

Mr. G.: "You will remember I was in to see you some time ago about the Hallberg Economizer. Well, at the time, I thought your price was high, and that I might obtain the same results with a cheaper device. I bought a cheap current saver, paying $40 for it, but after operating a week the coil got so hot it was not safe to run more than one show with it, and so I bought another of the same make, and by means of a double throw switch ran first with one coil, and when that got hot switched on the other one. Now, however, one of the coils has burned out and I am tired of fooling with them, besides the light is poor. What can you do for me?"

Mr. H.: "I will guarantee to save you more money on your current bill with the Hallberg than you did with those coils, and at the same time give you at least 35% better light. Also, since you were in my office last, I have cut the price of the 'Hallberg' to $75, as I am selling direct to the exhibitors."

Mr. G.: "If you can do this, and there is no danger of burn outs, it is all I can ask. Ship one at once."

(THREE WEEKS LATER.)

Mr. G.: "The Economizer is doing more than you claimed for it. I wish I had bought it when I first looked into the matter, even at the $100 price, as I would have saved money, produced better pictures and had no worry. Not only am I saving more money, but am getting a 50% better light on the screen; it does not get hot, and I have no worry about burn-outs. My customers comment on the excellent pictures I am now exhibiting and the brilliant light on the screen."

SPLENDID PATHE COMEDY

American Company Turns Out Exceptional Picture

EVERY now and then the Pathe American players turn out a comedy that is worthy of exceptional mention. "The Other Way," a subject dated for early release, is a comedy which, in the vernacular, would be called a "scream." It is one of those peculiar problems in matrimony in which man proposes and the principals in the case propose to do as they please.

According to the story there are two old cronies who have retired from active life and spend most of their time over a chess board. One has been blessed with a promising son; the other possesses a daughter of surpassing beauty and accomplishment. Being advised of the return of the young people from their respective colleges, the two old cronies compare notes and agree with each other that the young folks would make a very proper couple, and thereupon pledge each other that they are to be married forthwith. The young folks return to their respective parents, and after the usual greeting are separately informed that their future has been mapped out for them, and both at once balk at the proposition and leave their homes to find employment.

The young woman becomes governess in the family of a justice of the peace of her home town and the young man, by strange chance, finds employment in the same family as chauffeur. Neither one is particularly informed of the other's existence, and if they ever did know that their parents were boon companions they have long since forgotten the fact and are quite strangers. Thrown together in the same family circle they speedily become acquainted and fall in love. While indulging a few affectionate pleasantries they are discovered by their employer who inquiries into the situation, and discovering their desire to be married, performs the ceremony without delay.

Now that they are one, the young folks hasten to the telephone to inform their parents. The producer has introduced a little business here that is exceedingly effective. Being informed of the marriage of their children, both fathers fly into a rage and start post haste to look them up and properly denounce their hasty action. The surprise with which they discover the consummation of their fondest hopes when they feared the worst is adequately portrayed in the picture.

Any description will fail to do justice to the humor of this subject. There's a laugh in almost every foot and the climaxes are the funniest ever.

SCENE FROM "THE OTHER WAY."

PICTURES IN SOUTH AFRICA

E. D. Martin of Johannesburg, Discusses Situation with Jas. S. McQuade

E. D. Martin, representing the African Film Syndicate of Johannesburg, South Africa, was a visitor at the offices of American licensed manufacturers in Chicago recently.

Mr. Martin left Johannesburg Sept. 5; arrived in London (via Southampton), where he stopped over for a week, and landed in New York Oct. 10, where he remained for two days before coming out to the metropolis of the great Middle West.

The object of Mr. Martin's visit to this country is to make arrangements with agencies that represent the American licensed manufacturers, all makes being included in the list of films required for his syndicate, which confines its operations solely to the hiring, or renting, of films in the British possessions in South Africa. Heretofore the American product has been secured from certain London agencies, and the present aim is to secure it direct from the representatives of American manufacturers.

Mr. Martin assured me that the American output of licensed manufacturers is high in popular favor in South Africa, there being a constantly increasing demand for American comedies, Western pictures, dramas, scenics, etc. The European manufacturers sometimes produce a film that appeals to the popular taste out there, but Mr. Martin says that this is unusual.

The motion picture theatre came into vogue in South Africa in September, 1909, the traveling picture show having paved the way some time before that. At the present time Johannesburg, with a population of 70,000, has 22 picture theatres for whites and four for blacks, and, owing to its geographical position, it affords the best facilities as a center for renting films. Capetown now has seven theatres, but will support ten; Port Elizabeth has two, but will support three or four; East London has two, but can support three, or possibly four; Grahamtown will support one; so will King Williamstown; Kimberly has two, Bloemfontein has two; Germiston has five, but will support only three; Pretoria has five, but can support about four; Krugesdorp has two; Durban four; Maritzburg has one, but can support two; the same conditions exist in Salisbury; Bulawayo has two and Mafeking, which has no picture house at present, can support one. It will thus be seen that far removed South Africa has been seized by the ubiquitous motion picture and that the chief entertainment of the inhabitants is furnished by it.

Mr. Martin informed me that the standard of the picture theatre buildings in South Africa is being rapidly improved. The new theatres going up in the smaller towns have a seating capacity of about 500, while those being constructed in the larger cities will seat 1,000.

There is a marked difference between the prices of admission in the Coast cities and those inland or "up country." In the former, one pays 6 pence, or 12 cents of our money; in "up country" towns the usual charge is one shilling, or 24 cents; but, sometimes, as high as two shillings, or 48 cents, are charged. These varying prices prevail in Johannesburg.

The Coast cities run pictures only; in the inland, two vaudeville acts are usually employed. The program on the Coast consists of about 3,500 feet of film, with two changes weekly. The inland cities offer three reels of film (about 3,500 feet, as high as 1,200 feet being used on a reel) and two acts of vaudeville. The pictures are changed twice weekly, and the vaudeville once a week. These vaudeville acts cost each seven guineas weekly, or about $36 in our money. Local talent appears in the acts, as imported people are, necessarily, out of the question, the expense being prohibitive. Already the more intelligent patrons of pictures are showing an aversion to cheap vaudeville, and Mr. Martin stated that all indications point to the elimination of vaudeville from picture shows in South Africa, at no far off date.

The picture theatres in South Africa are well lighted, colored lights being used. Mr. Martin rather surprised me by drawing a contrast between the projection of pictures in America and in his home city, Johannesburg, his summing up being not at all favorable to us. He was particular in stating that their pictures are much clearer and steadier than ours and that patrons of a picture theatre in the South African city would not stand for some pictures that he had viewed in New York and Chicago, so far as projection is concerned.

What do you think of that for savage South Africa? We had better take a tumble and get down to bed rock.

All the members of the African Film Syndicate are Americans, being men of means either engaged in business or mining pursuits. Two of them are diamond drill contractors, who contract to make borings on mining claims that show good indications of gold. Mr. Martin is a native of New Orleans, and went to South Africa about ten years ago, in the interests of the Standard Oil Co. The African Film Syndicate was formed in August, 1910, and its members are sanguine of a rich harvest in the near years to come.

TESTIMONIAL DINNER TO MR. A. V. SMITH, TENDERED BY VITAGRAPH STAFF AT RAUB'S CAFE, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

A VITAGRAPH NIGHT

Members and Staff of Company Join in Testimonial Dinner to "Vic" Smith.

On Saturday evening, Oct. 29, a testimonial dinner was tendered Mr. Arthur "Vic" Smith, the cashier of the Vitagraph Company of America, at Raub's Garret, corner of Nevins and Fulton streets, Brooklyn, by the professional and manufacturing departments.

Among the invited guests were Mr. William T. Rock, president; Mr. J. Stuart Blackton, vice president and secretary, and Mr. Albert E. Smith, treasurer and business manager of the Vitagraph Company; Mr. James L. Hoff, of the "Film Index"; Mr. Frank Woods, of the "Dramatic Mirror"; Mr. P. Licari, of the Cary Printing Co.; Mr. S. McGuire, general manager of the National Printing Co., and Mr. Leroy E. Ball, of the law firm of Waldo & Ball.

The tables were arranged in the form of the letter V., decorated with flowers and especially designed favors. A very elaborate menu was served by a corps of waiters dressed in Louis XIV. costumes and wigs, while an orchestra discoursed appetizing music.

Mr. J. Stuart Blackton acted as toastmaster, and little talks fitting the occasion were made by many of those present.

Most noticeable at this gathering was the spirit of good fellowship which exists among the Vitagraph staff and between the principals of the company and the members of the staff. This banquet had a double significance, being the opening of the "Raub Garret," and Mr. Raub did everything in his power to add to the pleasure of the occasion by decorating the "Garret" and furnishing other evidences of his hospitality, including a colored quartet, the Raub orchestra; Miss Jean Irwin, soprano; Mr. Robbins, tenor, and Mr. H. Mayo, baritone, also contributed a few musical selections.

Members of the Vitagraph staff present were: William Arthur, W. B. Arthur, W. L. Ackerman, VanDyke Brooks, W. T. Bunyon, C. A. Burton, C. Blackwell, William Blackton, C. D. Chapman, M. Costello, L. Delaney, F. Esslinger, J. Ellwood, J. B. French, R. Gaillard, W. Humphreys, P. Hilburn, E. G. Hedden, M. Held, W. Healy, A. Herman, Ralph Ince, T. Johnson, Charles Kent, J. A. Leggett, O. Lovering, T. A. Maguire, H. T. Morey, E. L. Mackintosh, H. Mayo, E. R. Phillips, M. D. Renwick, A. Ross, R. S. Sturgeon, H. Schmidt, S. M. Spedon, W. Shea, S J. Turner, F. E. Thompson, R. Tompkins, H. Tuller, W. J. Watkins, E. W. Wentworth, A. Wenz, J. Woods and W. M. Zollinger, and last but not least, "Vic" Smith, "the host," and occasion of the celebration.

A most satisfying menu had been prepared by Caterer Raub, who won the hearts of his patrons on that night by his generosity and attention to their comfort and pleasure.

The engraving accompanying this story, though taken under difficulties, is a good likeness of the assemblage.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

"A heap big" Indian pictures are in course of completion under the direction of the Vitagraph Company which will give some life portrayals of an extremely picturesque type showing the peculiar customs and manners as well as some of the mythological conceptions of the aborigines of this country. There are Indian picture and Indian pictures, these are the exceptional kind, the Vitagraph kind.

Four divisions of the Vitagraph stock companies were in four different places this past week—Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York State and Maine furnished them with the necessary local coloring for some of their future releases which augur some very pretty scenery, thrilling cross country riding and stirring situations. The scenes include some from the coal and oil well country of the Keystone State. This week the full force is at work in the studio producing a drama from the work of a standard author that will create a widespread sensation.

Three Vitagraph feature films released this month will pulsate with heart interest; the kind that everybody likes: "In the Mountains of Kentucky," Saturday, November 5th; the Thanksgiving picture: "Drumsticks" on Tuesday, November 15; and "Francesco da Rimini" on Friday, November 18 ,the last is a classic that outclasses in point of acting and magnificence of scenery any previous presentation of "photoplay" drama.

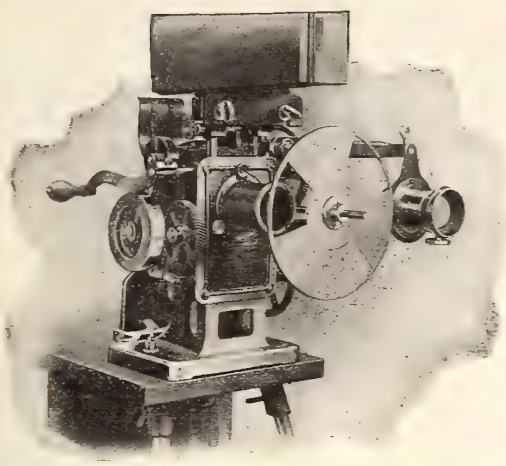
WELLMAN SLIDES A HIT.

The general opinion of the exhibitors is that the "recent event releases" made by Levi last week on Wellman's attempt to cross the Atlantic, are the best ever put on by that concern. Slides show with remarkable clearness the entire journey of the daring balloonists from their start at Atlantic City to the thrilling rescue made by the crew of the steamship Trent far at sea. The pictures contain a wonderful amount of detail never before procured in this kind of work.

Even Vaniman's little cat, the mascot of the party, is pictured in perfect content in his master's arms. The whole set is more than usually interesting, and at this time, when aerial navigation has received such widespread newspaper notoriety, it should make a decided success in any theatre.



POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6

THE PERFECT MOTION PICTURE MACHINE

"In reference to the Number Six Machine will say that I have been using one since August and find it a decided improvement over the various old type machines.

"We are able to get a picture which is remarkable for its steadiness and absence of flicker and the machine runs very quietly. I also find that I am able to project a picture at a much slower rate of speed than with the two blade shutter type machines and still get a flickerless picture. I am therefore able to show a picture at a speed in keeping with the motions portrayed in the film. Three to five minutes more can be gotten out of a reel if wanted, or on the other hand the film can be chased through with equally good results.

Uncle Tom's Plays Long Engagement.

Uncle Tom's Cabin, the Vitagraph Life Portrayal of Harriet Beecher Stowe's famous story, has been playing an exceedingly long engagement in Cleveland. President Mandelbaum, of the Lake Shore Film and Supply Company, says of this picture.

"In all the years of motion pictures no film has drawn bigger crowds. Uncle Tom's Cabin has drawn crowds steadily from Aug. 9 up to the present time in Cleveland, and is booked here solid until Nov. 10."

This is an extraordinary record for a motion picture play.

"HALLBERG" EQUIPS DORCHESTER THEATRE.

Mr. W. R. Lusher, proprietor of the New Dorchester theatre, Flatbush, Brooklyn, placed order last week with Mr. J. H. Hallberg, No. 36 East 23d street, for entire moving picture equipment, including two Motiograph motion picture machines, two "Hallberg" Economizers, two 4000-candle-power flaming arc lamps, and a new electric sign, which Mr. Hallberg has just imported from England. This sign saves two-thirds on the electric bill, and can be read at a longer distance and at a sharper angle than any other sign ever produced.

Mr. Lusher saw the Motiograph in operation last year in Earl's Court, London, England, and he was so favorably impressed that he would not consider any machine but the Motiograph for his new Dorchester theatre. The ventilation of the theatre will be accomplished by two "Hallberg" 24-inch exhaust fans, fitted with speed controllers and reversing switches, so as to act as either exhaust, or pressure fans.

Licensed pictures will be used.

SNIPES FOR M. P. THEATRES.

In addition to their handsome two?colored lithographed frames for posters, the Exhibitors' Advertising & Specialty Co., 105 East 14th street, New York, have gotten up a large number of variously worded snipes (to top off both half sheets and full sheet posters) in various colored inks and paper, reading "Biograph To-Day," "Vitagraph To-Day," "Selig Feature To-Day," "Now Playing," "Special To-Day," "Coming To-Morrow," "Don't Fail to See This,' and a great many other sayings, all specially appropriate for motion picture theatres. They are designed to take the place of cheap and gaudy or amateurish sign-painting, and in fact are so cheap in price that it would be the height of folly for exhibitors to bother having them painted. (See their announcement in our adv. columns.)

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"OH, THAT MOONLIGHT GLIDE."—Words by Junie McCree; music by Albert Von Tilzer; published by York Music Co. A novelty set of lyrics, on the present popular "Glide" theme, set to a melody which is gliding enough to suit anybody. Do you like novelties in song slides? What would you say to a whole set of them? They are here, all of them clever, amusing and original. One of Wheeler's "Darky" sets that always take so well.

"THAT'S WHEN LIFE'S ONE GRAND SWEET SONG."—Words by Will D. Cobb; music by Marie Theresa Laing; published by Shapiro, New York. The lyrics tell the story of a young married couple who are happy in their own love and care not for millions. Beautifully told, as Mr. Cobb is a past master in the art of song writing. Another Shapiro sure fire hit. Did one say snappy? Yes, this is a snappy set of slides. Pretty models who are well dressed and situations that are both amusing and beautiful.

"WHEN THE IVY TURNS TO BROWN AND GOLD."—Lyrics by Hansen and Klein; music by Al. F. Butler; published by Jerome H.' Remick & Co. A seasonable ballad, which, while the theme is old, is treated in a more than pleasing style. Both lyrics and melody are unique. What a collection of beautiful vines and colors in a set of slides! All the beauties of nature pent up in one little set of song slides. Could you ask for more?

Scott & Van Altena.

"I'M ON THE RIGHT SIDE OF THE RIGHT GIRL AT THE RIGHT TIME AND PLACE."—Words by Monroe Rosenfeld; music by J. Fred Helf; published by J. Fred Helf Co., New York. We believe that you, Mr. Exhibitor, will be on the right track if you get this song and the slides that illustrate it. The lyrics say that love is like a ball game—you never know just how you'll score. But that does not apply to the lover of song slides, for in this set you can count on beautiful poses, graceful models and coloring that is superb. Novelties also—a many.

"IS THERE ANYTHING ELSE THAT I CAN DO FOR YOU?"—Words by Irving Berlin; music by Ted Snyder; published by Ted Snyder Co., New York. Now here's a set of slides that's full of fun. Good rollicking home scenes; the pranks of mischievous children and the like. Beautifully colored and shaded.

"LET ME HAVE A KISS UNTIL TO-MORROW."—Words by Thos. W. Gray; music by Edna Williams; published by Jos. W. Stern & Co., New York. Judging from the looks of the model employed in these illustrations, no doubt many of us would like to borrow the above—a kiss—and even pay it back. If you can't do that, why, of course, the next best thing is to rent the slides and have a look. You'll be pleased.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"I'M GOING TO TAKE THE TRAIN FOR HOME, SWEET HOME."—Words and music by Herbert H. Ingraham, author of such world-famous hits as "Hoo-Hoo, Ain't You Coming Out To-Night?" "You Are the Ideal of My Dreams," "Roses Bring Dreams of You," published by Shapiro. This is the last song written by this wonderfully versatile composer, and Simpson has shown his knowledge of stagecraft by the clever grouping of actors in their varied poses. The hero is shown spurning the temptations of the big city, the return to the old farm, the suburban station, country lanes, life on the farm, etc. There are a couple of novelty slides, too—such as are in such great demand just now.

Levi Company, Inc.

"GO WAY FROM ME, I HATE YOU; COME BACK TO ME, I LOVE YOU."—Words by Will D. Cobb; music by John H. Flynn, writers of "Yip-I-Addy-I-Ay"; published by Shapiro. This is one of those combination kid songs that always make good. Lyrics are good and the melody beautiful. All four models are good looking and consequently the set is excellent.

"WOULDN'T YOU LIKE TO TAKE A LITTLE GIRL TO RAISE."—Words by Dave Radford; music by Leo Bennett; published by the Cadillac Music Co. A very good song; good-looking models; beautiful scenery and perfect photography.

"I'LL ALWAYS BE YOUR FRIEND."—Words and music by Nellie V. O'Grady; published by F. B. Haviland. One of those clever little ballads with a pretty melody. The slides tell the story in an artistic manner and the song should prove a pronounced success.

—EXCELSIOR SLIDE CO.

"SOMETHING DOING, KID."—Words and music by Marion Monroe; published by the Music House of Laemmle, New York. Laemmle's latest hit—one that is already very popular and one that they intend to push greatly. Eighteen slides in this set.

"TELL IT TO MURPHY, SWEENEY KNOWS IT."—Words by Paul Cunningham; music by Harry Seymour; published by F. A. Mills. Slides by Excelsior Co.

CONCERNING SIMPSON SOLAR SCREENS.

Now that an order has been issued in New York City to the effect that every picture theatre must be lighted up before November 20, or the license revoked, Simpson's Solar Screen has come into more than usual prominence and is being considered by many of the exhibitors in New York as the only way out of their present difficulties. It is quite well known that the Simpson Solar Screen is the only device for which it is claimed that pictures may be projected in a well-lighted room.

The solar screen is fully patented and Mr. Simpson lays claim to the only right to manufacture and sell a screen coated with or any part of which is of aluminum, powdered or solid.

CONCERNING THE MOTIOGRAPH.

The officials of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company announce that they have established the following agencies in Canada: Charles Potter, Toronto, Ont.; Great Western Film Co., Winnipeg, Man.; Crystal Palace Film Exchange, Montreal, Que.

The first models of the Motiograph were placed on the market three years ago, and these identical machines are still running successfully. The rise of this machine has been steady and continuous ever since. Its growth into popular favor has been a certainty from the first.

The reputation the Motiograph established at the start for projecting fine pictures is now equalled by its reputation for durability, gained by three years of the heaviest work, and the makers are now reaping the benefit of their efforts in the widespread demand which is being made for their equipments.

Caught by the Camera

An unusual story of marked dramatic interest wherein a crime seemingly committed by one man is shown to have been done by another through the silent evidence of a photographic plate unconsciously exposed by the murderer at the instant that he struck the blow. To add to the intensity the plate is developed by the sister of the murderer, who loves the man accused of the crime and she is divided between love, justice and sisterly affection. In the end justice wins and she releases the man she loves even though by so doing she frees him to become the husband of her rival. The incidents are strikingly handled and the points established with such care that nothing is left unexplained and the entire story may be closely followed by a person unable to read.

Released Thursday, November 17th.

Length about 990 feet.

Right in Front of Father

The Film Index had something to say about this clever little story in its last issue. It's a snappy little tale of two youngsters who are told that they will be disinherited if they marry without the evident consent of their parents' presence. Effecting an exchange of identities whereby the bride becomes the groom and vice versa they are married with their unsuspecting parents as witnesses and having been married right in front of father the compact holds good. Don't miss getting this if you want to do your audiences a favor.

LEADING AMERICAN EXPONENT OF THE PHOTOPLAY

LET THE PUBLIC BE WARNED

Stock-Jobbing Motion Picture Schemes are Barefaced Swindles

ONE of the burdens that every successful line of human endeavor is compelled to bear is the operations of the professional promoter and stock-jobber. In this respect, the motion picture business has been fairly free from the illicit operations of that peculiar class of light-fingered gentry who endeavor to extract good money from the pockets of the ignorant and gullible public. But it is not altogether exempt, for the stock-jobber is at work fooling the people with lurid tales of a get-rich-quick nature, and endeavoring to exchange bright-hued certificates of stock in paper corporations of high-sounding title, but no tangible assets, for genuine coin of the realm, upon the representation that fortunes are to be made in the picture business.

It is true that fortunes—modest ones—have been made in pictures, but all such accumulations of wealth had for their beginnings a legitimate investment, a definite business which was conducted on much the same lines that characterize other legitimate commercial enterprises. There has been no sudden accretion of wealth; no getting of something for nothing. In every instance where success has been achieved there has been a corresponding effort—an investment of experience and skill and the prime requisite of business ability, together with the ever-necessary capital. In every instance something has been produced that supplied a demand.

The Film Index feels the necessity of making these observations and for sounding this warning to the public, for the reason that it is reported that there is being offered for sale to investors stock in corporations bearing titles that would indicate that they were based upon some legitimate effort in the field of motion pictures; that there was at the foundation of the so-called corporations some definite and considerable investment of money-earning capacity, or some device of known and tested value for which there is a definite demand.

Upon the strength of these supposititious representations, the public is being asked to invest its money in the capital stock of these corporations, with the promise that the returns will be large.

Let the public be warned: there is not, in all America, a single legitimate enterprise, actual or contemplated, connected either directly or remotely, with the business of motion pictures or any of its branches, that is offering or inteds offering its securities, common or preferred, at public sale.

Possessors of idle capital, seeking a place of investment, will save themselves serious loss by scrutinizing with the utmost care any representation of profits to be earned from motion picture enterprises. This course should be adopted and adhered to, regardless of who the sponsors or underwriters may be.

The relation of The Film Index to the motion picture business is such that it is in position to know that there is not contemplated by responsible and reliable person or persons, or corporation, now engaged in the motion picture business in any of its branches, the formation of a corporation, the stock of which is to be offered to the public. And anyone offering such stock or proposing to form a corporation, the stock of which is to be offered for public sale, should be carefully investigated not only by the investor, but by the United State Post Office authorities.

It may not be known to the general public, yet these statements may easily be verified; there is at present no possible chance for the success of corporate investment in the motion picture business independent of the interests now in control of the field.

Manufacturers working under the licenses based upon the patents of Thomas A. Edison are the only interests possessing the element of absolute security of investment. These interests embrace fully 80 per cent. of the volume of business, are fully subscribed close corporations, and are not seeking capital for any purpose.

The remaining 20 per cent. of the business in sight is more than supplied by the infringing, or "independent," manufacturers and their allies. These interests are conducting business under many disadvantages and at constant risk of confiscation, and their profits are necessarily small and uncertain, while their expenses are large and burdensome.

Outside of these interests, there is absolutely no chance for profitable investment, and the issuance of stock to the public in any corporation that pretends to be based upon the motion picture business amounts to little less than a barefaced swindle.

Heretofore, The Film Index has taken occasion to denounce raids upon the public of this character, and this warning is now issued for the reason that it is informed that other similar raids are contemplated.

There is little chance that motion picture men will be taken in by the glittering prospectus of these swindling concerns, but the uninformed public is a ready victim.

Let the Public be Warned.

WORLD'S SERIES A BIG ATTRACTION.

The World's Baseball series, between the Philadelphia Athletics and the Chicago Cubs, has certainly attracted large audiences at all photoplay theatres, where this latest Essanay product has been shown. In New York, especially, the pictures took well, and the photos of Chief Bender, Connie Mack, Eddie Collins, Jack Coombs, Barry and other Athletic stars brought a rousing reception. Of the Cub players, Miner Brown, of "three diget" fame, was the same popular pitcher, as he has always been with the New York fans.

If the pictures tell what kind of ball the Athletics played, the fans were frank to admit that the Philadelphians were the greatest baseball machine that ever existed. At the Lincoln Square and Ganes' theatres, the pictures were well received. They should be great money makers in all big baseball cities.

THERE has been an almost unanimous response by the manufacturers of licensed pictures to the demand from exhibitors for bulletins that are suitable to display in front of the house. The Index has called attention to this matter on several occasions through letters on the subject written by exhibitors. The question seemed to be of sufficient importance to deserve investigation by the manufacturers with the result that a new form of bulletin has been adopted.

It is not intended that this bulletin shall entirely supplant the longer form of description. The latter will always be found in The Index, but the new bulletin will be supplied in sufficient numbers to all exhibitors to enable them to make the desired display on their bulletin boards.

Now that the new service is fairly inaugurated there are some features that deserve attention. One is mentioned by a correspondent, who complains that many of the manufacturers print the release dates too prominently on these bulletins. This, it is claimed by the complainant, serves to defeat, in a measure the purpose of the bulletin. Release dates are for the information of the exhibitor and mean nothing to the public, as the date of exhibition is indefinite, hence it is likely to be misleading if too prominently displayed on a bulletin intended for public information.

However, Rome was not builded in a day. Give the manufacturers time and they will eventually develop this bulletin idea into something really serviceable and artistic.

THE FILM INDEX has been handed the following memorandum of an action in which the Sherman Anti-Trust Law was pleaded in defense of an action to recover the purchase price of film:

An important case has just been decided in the Ohio State Court of Appeal in a matter in which Pathé Frères were alleged to be in an unlawful conspiracy with other manufacturers in restraint of trade in violation of the Sherman Act and the Valentine Act in the State of Ohio.

About two and a half years ago Pathé Frères brought suit against the Co-Operative Film Syndicate of North Baltimore, Ohio, in the Court of Common Pleas of Wood County, Ohio, for tne recovery of the purchase price of films. The defendants through their lawyer asked damages of Pathé Frères in the sum of $20,000. Judgment was given in favor of Pathé Frères for the price of the goods sold and delivered, and Pathé Frères also won out on the question of the alleged trust, on the appeal which took place a few days ago. This judgment was confirmed in its entirety.

The instance above quoted was the first in which the anti-trust law was invoked as a defense in a suit to recover the price of film. The judgment of the court in dismissing the allegations of the debtor and ordering the payment of the debt should settle the question of "trust" where licensees of the Motion Picture Patents Company are concerned. This decision will dispose of several similar actions based on the Sherman law.

THE surprising attitude of one of our esteemed contemporaries toward the dominant interests in the motion picture business of America reminds us of nothing so much as the ancient fable of the Ox and the Frog. Many of our readers will remember the story. In substance it goes something like this: A green and slimy Frog, splashing about in the scum and ooze of his puddle, spied a particularly sleek and fat Ox feeding leisurely upon the succulent grass in the meadow surrounding. Settling himself upon a rock that protruded above the muck of his puddle, the Frog blinked his bleery eyes at the fat Ox and became even more green with jealousy. "Forsooth," croaked he, "wherefore is this Ox so fat; am I not greater than he?" Straightway the Frog began to puff himself up with hot air and to proclaim to the gadflies that he was greater than the Ox. Then he puffed himself up still more and then some, until he burst with his own importance.

As for the Ox, he flicked a gadfly off his left ear with his tail and continued to contentedly consume the succulent grass of the meadow.

READERS of The Film Index are taking considerable interest in the special departments of practical information which have recently been started in its columns. The Hallberg articles on Electricity take the lead in the matter of importance and constitute a text book of information on the relation of electricity to the picture theatre. The ability of the writer and his experience as an inventor of electrical devices calculated to give greater efficiency to the electrical current in its application to the projection of pictures makes his articles invaluable to the operator and manager.

As editor of the Projection Department Mr. Will C. Smith is particularly well fitted to discuss the common troubles of the motion picture operator and to give him sound advice on matters relating to the projection of pictures. Mr. Smith has had much valuable experience as an operator and is conceded to be one of the best in the business.

"Playing the Pictures," the title of a series of articles on the subject of music accompaniments for pictures, written by Clyde Martin, is attracting attention everywhere. Others who are giving the subject proper consideration have written of their work and are commending the advice of Mr. Martin as "safe and sane."

It is the purpose of The Film Index to continue to give its readers the benefit of the best advice obtainable on all subjects relating to the various branches of theatre management. The start that has been made in this line of journalistic effort has no equal when the value of the information given is taken into account.

FROM THE WILD AND WOOLLY.

Theatre Manager at Telluride, Colo., Gives His Point of View.

Telluride, Colo., Sept. 14, 1910.

Editor The Film Index:

Dear Sir—It is with great pleasure I address these few lines to you. You surely have the motion picture business to heart, and that little paper, The Film Index, is beyond a doubt the greatest paper in existence for any exhibitor of licensed pictures. I look for The Index like I look for a meal.

Your paper is not only full of news, but helpful to all your subscribers. Letters from other managers are especially helpful to me; managers that are having the actual experience in this business. I like to read other managers' views, how they are running their business, etc.

Your idea of showing some of the old pictures over again is good, for there are a great many people going to see motion pictures to-day that two years ago, or even a year ago, never saw inside of a picture show. At that time it was child's play; now if we had to depend on children to come I think there would be a few failures. I know I would go under. Even if they have seen these pictures, it would not hurt them to see them over again.

I am closing my summer engagement in this town the 15th of this month (September 15), but will continue to act as manager for the firm of Cooper & Cooper, owning half interest myself.

July and August I did a better business than at any time since the house opened two years ago. During the past two months I was running three reels, no songs, but whenever I could get a chance I would use a novelty act of some kind. While I don't believe in running vaudeville with motion pictures, at the same time we must please our patrons. I make more clear money on pictures alone, but as I said before, the secret of success is pleasing the people. I have been in the show business most all my life, as a musician, etc., and I have known of several managers going broke trying to force something on the people they did not want, such as dramatic acts in vaudeville, etc. A good dramatic play, played by a good company, when every word can be heard, takes fairly well, but let a good comedy company come in the next night and you won't have standing room. This has been tried here many a time. What the people want is comedy, and more comedy, in picture shows. They claim they are tired and want to let their minds rest, so they go to the picture show. If they see a picture that doesn't take any thinking and they can have a good laugh, they go out thinking they have seen a great show, and will come back. I have found to mix up a good program in this town takes well. I try to run a Western picture, a light drama and the rest comedy. And I am packing the house every night.

Mr. H. H. Buckwalter, manager of the Denver Film Exchange, furnishes me films, and I must say that he is the greatest manager I ever met. He is all for the exhibitor. If a man deals with Buckwalter he will come out on top. I owe it to him for my success. Any time I write to him for a picture he sends it as soon as he can arrange it. A good many times he would hold a picture for me until shipping day and not charge me extra. He sure is a good man.

We will start Oct. 1 to enlarge our show house by adding 200 more chairs and building on the back end. At present we are seating about 300. We are planning to build a 50-foot stage and equip it with all kinds of scenery to accommodate all road shows; this will mean a big thing to us. We intend putting in a new Edison No. 6 machine and fixing up the inside to look like a first class show house. Our house is lighted all the time the pictures are running.

I want to say a few words about some of the pictures and their makers. In the first place, I would like to suggest if you could get a good critic like E. P. Sargents to give a brief outline of all the licensed pictures released. Give us their opinion of the pictures, good or bad; it would make that little paper of yours worth twice as much. This is only a suggestion. Now to go on with my story. The Edison pictures take fairly well. The "Cuba" and "Bumptious" pictures are fine; they are beginning to make a hit. Any pictures that are taken on the coast showing the ocean or scenery that we read about are bound to take. The Essanay Company's comedies are great, and Western pictures good; they are making a big hit here.

Of late Mr. Buckwalter started to send me some of the Kalem Indian pictures, and I hope he will keep it up; they are fine. Just like we read about in history and picture in our minds. To-night I am showing Kalem "Brave Hearts." Edison's "Judgment of the Mighty Deep," and Pathe's "Post Mistress." The Pathe's by request. I have run only a few Melies pictures, but every one makes a hit. Pathe's hand colored and trick pictures can't be beat. Of course all educational and scenic pictures are good, no matter what make. But the king of all pictures are the Selig. Any time I advertise a Selig feature reel, I have the S. R. O. sign out before the show is half over. I get 25 cents admission for such pictures,

The Vitagraph pictures are good, but I must say a few words about "Uncle Tom's Cabin." I was very much disappointed in these pictures, I must say. For most all the Vitagraph pictures take well up here. In the first reel the scene of Eliza crossing the ice was very poor—not real enough. Why didn't they, in the second reel, use Topsy to give us some comedy. The pictures were altogether too sad for the average motion picture patron. The death of Little Eva was a frost. There was a chance for the Vitagraph people to make a good showing on dissolving scenes. In every play I saw, they tried to show the angels coming down and taking Little Eva's spirit to heaven. Most every body kicked on that part. My, but what a fine scene could have been made at the end of reel No. 2. The Vitagraph Company tried to do too much with that famous play that everybody has read and seen many a time, and know it almost by heart. Some of the scenes and acting were very good. Next time pay more attention to the important parts. I would like to hear someone else's opinion on this picture.

I have noticed quite a few remarks in your Index in regard to posters. Mr. Buckwalter sends me one poster with every reel. Some of them are good drawing cards; everybody will stop and gaze at them. But other posters they would not waste the time to look at, let alone to stop. Give us the climax or some scene that really happens in the picture. I am judging from the Telluride people, for remember, this is what they call the "wild and woolly West." Excitement is what they crave for.

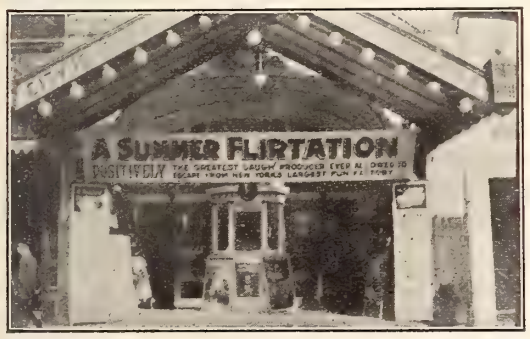
The motion picture business as a business is advancing rapidly in this Western country, according to all reports.

The population of Telluride is over 2,500. It supports one show good, but with two shows some one will lose out. When we opened two years ago, out of 2,500 there was about 50 showgoing people. At present we are showing to from 200 to 300 people daily. In two years more watch where we will be. Telluride is a high place to live; in the first place, we are 9,000 feet in the air; in the second place, it costs 25 cents for a shave and 50 cents for a hair cut; everything else in proportion. Our express bill is $2 per day to and from Denver, Colo., so, whoever reads this, don't think all we make is clear profit. I showed Selig's "Ranch Life in the Great South-West," and it was the best drawing card I ever had. Inclosed find a short clipping from our daily. If it wasn't that the show season is supposed to be over and lots of places closed, I would not think of writing about this motion picture success during the summer.

Yours respectfully,
EDW. J. COOPEN,
Mgr. Metropole Theatre.

"SUMMER FLIRTATION" WAS A HIT.

C. M. Simmons, managers of the City Theatre, Seattle, Wash., sends a photo of his house showing a display made for Pathe's American comedy, "A Summer Flirtation," which is herewith reproduced. Regarding the picture Mr. Simmons writes: "Last week I had the pleasure of running one of your American releases entitled



"A Summer Flirtation," and you can see by photo enclosed that we tried to give it equally as much publicity as the merits of the subject could claim. However, I think we fell short of our good intentions, as no power of pen could describe the amount of amusement afforded my audience as they witnessed the unraveling of this tangle of laughs."

Messrs. Clune, Wheelock and Boland have obtained the motion picture privileges on the Marine street pleasure pier, Ocean Park, the ocean resort of Los Angeles, Cal. To accommodate their plans, a $10,000 play house will be built on the end of the pier.

The new Palace photoplay theatre, Morristown, N. J., opened Oct. 27. E. Esposetio, the owner, and Manager Robert Ellis will do their best to give the patrons a first class up to date show.

COMING PATHE COMEDY, "HOW RASTUS GOT HIS TURKEY."

The Pathe American players have produced another very good farce comedy, which is soon to be released under the title "How Rastus got his Turkey."

Rastus need scarcely be said is "cullud gemman" with a pronounced longing for poultry. His persistance in a predatory effort to secure a turkey is crowned with success and Rastus, after much effort, arrives home with the coveted bird. There is much rejoicing upon his arrival and the bird is duly prepared and served with all the comedy trimmings that belong to such an auspicious event.

NOT A "PICTURE" INDIAN.

A western exhibitor, who objects to "Indian" pictures, sent us the photo from which the above engraving was made, with the request that it be given to some actor who wishes to play Indian. "This is the real article; when he sees it he may forget his desire."

NEW IOWA HOUSE.

Missouri Valley, Iowa, is to have a new photoplay house. Contracts were closed Nov. 5th and the plans, as accepted by Mr. Vert Van Patten, the owner, call for a theatre costing $10,000, exclusive of the interior decorations. It has been leased for a term of years by C. C. Pratt, present owner of the Palm Theatre. The policy of the new house will be licensed photoplays, exclusively. When complete, this theatre will be one of the most complete and modern in the middle west.

SIMPSON TO PROSECUTE.

Alfred L. Simpson sends us word that he is about to institute suits for damages against all concerns manufacturing screens, or preparations for screens, that infringe his patent on the Simpson Solar Screen. This action on Mr. Simpson's part is taken, he says, because many infringing substitutes for his invention have recently been placed on the market with the aim of getting some of the business that rightfully belongs to him.

His basic patent covers:—A screen for projecting images consisting of a base of any suitable material and a metallic coating of aluminum or any compound of aluminum, bronze, tin, or any metallic composition resembling the same.

According to this, any exhibitor using a screen of the above mentioned nature, that is not a Simpson Solar Screen, is also liable to civil suit for damages.

NEW LUBIN BULLETINS.

Answering the demand from exhibitors for a bulletin sheet printed upon one side of the paper only the bulletins of the Lubin Manufacturing Company now appear in the form of large sheets carrying a cut eight by six inches with a large block title and a succinct description in large type. The release date and other data appears at the bottom where it may be marked out or cut off as may be desired by exhibitors who do not use first run. The bulletins are shipped rolled in mailing tubes that unsightly creases may be avoided and will make a most attractive lobby display.

HAS DENVER SOLVED THE PROBLEM?

Does the Fire and Police Board Limitation of the Number of Licenses Aid in Regulating the Exhibitor?

By EPES WINTHROP SARGENT (Chicot)

IN a recent issue of The Film Index James R. Noland, formerly a theatrical and newspaper man, but for the past several years the secretary to the Fire and Police Board of Denver, calls attention to the fact that that body has solved the problem of regulating picture shows by limiting the number of licenses granted to these exhibitions.

In personal letters to the writer Mr. Noland has dilated upon this feature and declares that the scheme is the most feasible of many plans suggested, and in some aspects of the case the contention seems to be supported. Mr. Noland writes that the limited number of licenses have a cash value in the vicinity of $1,000, the license being disposed of by purchase precisely as though it were a real property instead of a concession. A man wishing to open a picture theatre in Denver seeks the exhibitor most likely to be willing to sell and makes his bid.

It can be seen that since this license possesses a very definite value the possession of that license is to be desired and an exhibitor will use all proper care to see that his license is not revoked for cause. Denver at the present time possesses better lighted picture theatres than any other city in the country because Mr. Noland reads The Film Index and when the question came up he knew that it was entirely possible to light the house to a proper extent and still offer a brilliant projection. It was a case of a lighted house or a revoked license and the houses were lighted. In the same manner the orders of the Fire Department were enforced to the letter and other local regulations carefully observed.

All of this makes for efficient regulation and at the same time the proper proportioning of the licenses in respect to the population makes for the prosperity of all exhibitors.

The violation of regulations and the consequent revocation of the license amounts virtually to a fine of $1,000 irrespective of what the law may decree as penalty to say nothing of the loss of the house, and Denver is well administered as to its picture houses. The supervision maintained is liberal. There was the usual debate on the Jeffries-Johnson pictures and numerous delegations invaded City Hall to protest against their showing in Denver, but the delegations were turned down with what courtesy they deserved and the pictures were shown to no noticeable detriment to the morals of the inhabitants. A similar liberality obtains in the matter of dramatic stories and a small son keeps the censor in touch with the point of view of the juvenile mind.

All this seems to argue that, as Mr. Noland claims, the Denver solution is ideal. Perhaps it might be could the same liberality be shown elsewhere, but would such be the case?

The Fire and Police Board of Denver enjoys a unique position amongst the administrations of the cities. It is all-powerful in the matter of granting privileges of all sorts and so firmly intrenched that it does not have to fear the wails of the reformers even though women enjoy state suffrage and can threaten the influence of their vote at the polls. The Fire and Police Board keeps right on doing business and the senseless wails of the reformers fall upon deaf ears.

There are other cities where the license question already is a source of profit to the politicians of the inner circle, though licenses are supposed to be issued to any place conforming to the regulations. Given the right to limit the number of licenses and the already arbitrary actions would become sheer tyranny.

And then again there are police officials, poor, spineless creatures, holding their offices by popular voice who grovel in the dust before the reformers when it comes to questions of photoplayhouses, who censor photoplays to suit the ultra modest ideas of reform organizations and who make themselves and their office ridiculous. Surely in such hands the Denver plan would not work for the good of the business. The Denver board has the advantage of the advice of a trained showman and the plan works well but that is no guarantee that the generality of police heads are in any degree fitted to exercise a Censorship over photoplays or any other matter.

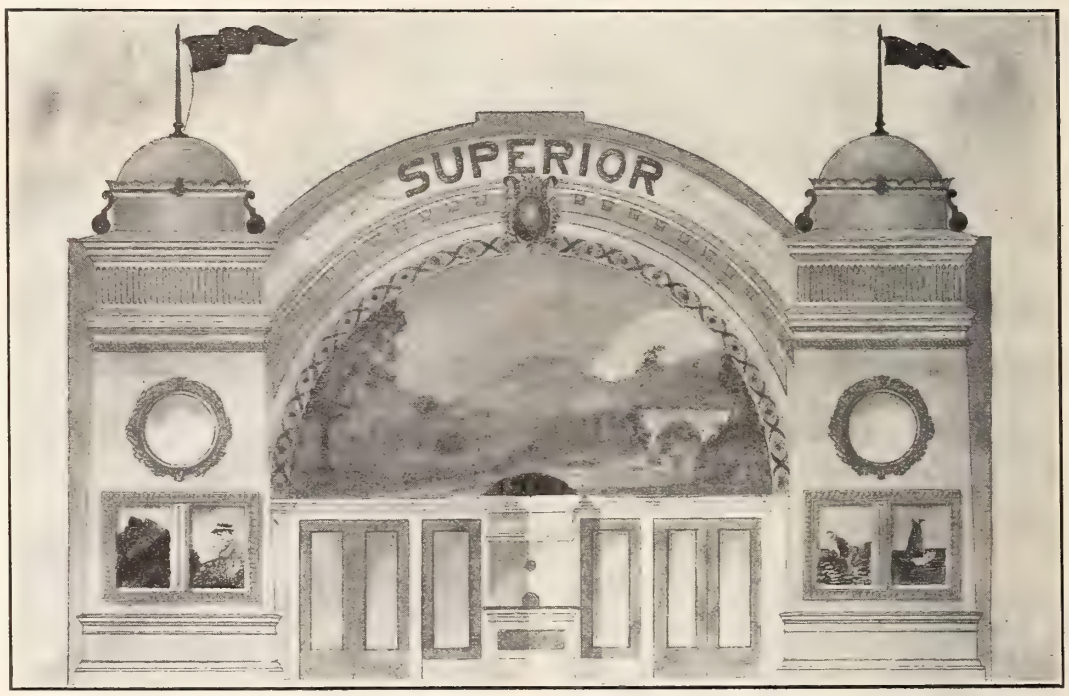
The Denver plan works well in Denver but it is not the universal solution of a vexed problem and it would be better to let matters take their natural course.

Already it is apparent that the "store show" field is rapidly narrowing to such localities as will not support a more pretentious venture and with the coming of the larger houses, where for the same admission fees a more important program is presented, many of the features of the store show will be done away with. The larger house requires the management of the trained showman who is competent to deal with the problems of direction and the man who considers anything good enough is gradually dropping out.

When it comes right down to a question of fact the public is its own best censor. It knows what it wants and a sufficient majority want what is right to influence the remainder. This is pointed out in the regular playhouses where the salacious farces of last season are being cold shouldered out of existence. For a time they were the rage and the theatres were crowded but the more healthful taste reasserted itself and the dramatized lobster palace is being relegated to the storehouse. In the same way the demand for highly melodramatic photoplays is passing. The larger houses recognize this fact and if only they could be induced to drop the abominable vaudeville that some of them consider an added attraction the large house with a smart program of pictures and song would automatically solve the problem without debate.

This is shown in many residential localities where the erection of a first class theatre for the showing of pictures creates a new clientele. Loss of business is even more serious than the loss of a $1,000 license and the box office is a quickening conscience.

The Denver plan is all right—for Denver—but it depends entirely upon those in power whether restriction makes for good or evil conditions. The intelligent portion of the public is the only real remedy.



SUPERIOR THEATRE, CLEVELAND, OHIO.

New photoplay house recently erected by George W. Heinbrich, located on Superior Street, opposite East 85th Street. One of the finest modern examples of picture theatre architecture.

LENHART THEATRE, OKLA., OPENS.

The Lenhart photoplay theatre has at last been completed and opened its doors to the public Oct. 14. The house is one of the largest and most modern in Oklahoma and the attendance since the opening has brought proofs that the house will pay. An Edison machine has been installed in a fireproof booth and a new electric sign has been placed in front of the house. On Saturday afternoons the management has made it a point to put on as many educational pictures as possible, and all school children will be admitted to the matinee free of charge.

Ground was broken on Oct. 28 for a new motion picture house. The location of the new house is between 1st South and 2d South, on State street, Salt Lake City, Utah. C. W. Midgley, manager of the Casino theatre, left Oct. 28 for Los Angeles to sign a lease on the site for a long term of years.

REGARDING EDUCATIONAL FILMS

Correspondent Wants to Know Why They Can't Be Made More Interesting

By W. H. K.

WHY is it that the so-called "Educational" motion picture is classed by the average exhibitor as a "chaser," and that he complains loudly when too many of them are included in his program? Why is it that when one comes on the screen the average patron of photoplay houses—if he thinks he has seen most of the show—puts on his hat and a rainy Monday expression of countenance, and pikes hastily for the exit?

Is it because Mr. Average Patron objects to being educated by the film method of culture?—or is it because the Educational pictures fail to educate, or even interest him?

Now, even a travelogue can be made interesting. If you don't believe this paradox, take a trip into the Keith and Proctor house on Fourteenth street, New York, and be illuminated. Along about the middle of the evening, a gentleman with spectacles and no more hair than is necessary to sprinkle over a bald spot, comes out and says things about Japan. It isn't what he says, but the way he says it, that keeps his audience from the inevitable yawn. It is apparently interested. And at the end, he is generously and invariably applauded—which is going some for a plain travelogue.

What Dr. Burr can do for the travelogue, the Licensed Manufacturers can surely do for the Educational film—put personality and vitality into the picture, and make it more than a mere filler-in between the photoplays.

Mr. Average Patron sat in the bald-headed row of a photoplay theatre the other evening, arriving just as a Lubin comedy wound up with a bully climax and the Liberty Bell trademark. It was a bit inconsequential, perhaps, but Mr. Average Patron liked it, and cackled visibly and loudly. He was a middle-aged undertaker, if a black tie and a settled serenity of solemnity count for anything, but he was out for an evening of relaxation even if two burials and a cremation awaited his services the next morning.

After the comedy came a vaudeville turn, and Mr. Average Patron liked that. Next, the operator began turning the crank of his machine, and a picture followed of a scene in South America. Here was good opportunity for scenic display; of the snowy Andes, of the strange life and customs of our neighbors below the line, and of a thousand and one subjects of human interest to be found there. But there wasn't an inch of these. It was a half reel showing the progress of a flock of llamas through an uninteresting village and over a dreary mountain pass. Llamas, and practically nothing more! Is there anything particularly interesting or graceful about a troop of overgrown sheep, or, rather, undergrown camels?

Was Mr. Average Patron disgusted? He was! He pulled out a newspaper, shuffled the pages loudly to indicate to the management that for all he cared South America could go plumb straight to Sheol. The film was fully up to the average of travel pictures, and Mr. Average Patron had seen many worse in his time, but he couldn't understand why such subjects were chosen for development when there was all the world to choose from in the selection.

We all like to travel. Some of us travel because we have the money, and some of us because we have other people's money. The rest of us stay at home because we haven't any money, aside from a few dollars for the gas man and ten cents a week for photoplays. Mr. Average Patron is among the great majority, and if he cannot go around the world, he is interested in having the world come around to him. And he isn't the least bit interested in llamas, or ruins of religious temples in Java, or chicken farms, or even marvelous sunsets, which show up finely at a first-run and then fade rapidly into a blur of scratches and dull color.

What he wants to see is the world—the big, brown ball of Life, teeming with wonderful scenery and more wonderful peoples. And he wants to see some personality behind the pictures, and before it likewise.

There is an incident in a good many travel pictures, particularly in the African variety, that always draws a laugh from even Mr. A. Patron. It is when the scenic director in charge of the stage-management of the picture has gone off to chase a dog or an unruly subject from before the camera, and the little black boys run into the field of view and make faces at the operator. This is "personality" with a vengeance, but it makes a good picture out of a mediocre one.

Put Life into the travel pictures—not stage-management and posing—and you will get tangible results.

Suppose, Mr. Scenic Director, that you had never been anywhere, or seen anything of the world worth mentioning. That being the case, as it is with ninety-nine one-hundredths of the people who view your films, would you rather see a photographic view of an ostrich farm—or a personally-conducted panorama of Washington or Niagara Falls? Wouldn't you rather see most anything else in the world than the subjects chosen for film release during the year 1910?

There are interesting subjects worth reproducing, and without traveling into the forgotten corners of the universe to get them. Burton Holmes and Dwight Elmendorf make an easy living and traveling expenses paid by showing one-half of the world how the other half lives. See Elmendorf lecture on Yellowstone Park and the Grand Canon, and learn how to put individuality into a motion picture. Burton Holmes, or whoever takes his motion pictures, can put more life and naturalness into a picture of a cab drive down Rotten Row than certain scenic directors could inject into a moving representation of Hell.

These are strong words, but for the good and future of the motion picture industry the terms are not overdrawn. A weighty part of the destiny of the photoplay hangs on the development of the Educational end of the business, and it is time that somebody woke up and took notice of the fact. With a supply of live travel films and "topicals" to draw from there would be no need of illustrated songs and vaudeville to hold the attention of an audience; and there would be more money in the box office and the safes of both exchange proprietor and film manufacturer at the end of the month.

And Mr. Average Patron would stuff the "Letterbox" columns of every newspaper in Motion Picturedom with his words of commendation and applause.

COWBOYS AND BACHELOR GIRLS

An Interesting Study of the Bachelor Girl by Melies.

If boys will be boys, then girls will be girls, and a woman is a woman after all, whether she be a suffragette, a prohibitionist, or merely a "Bachelor Girl." These same "Bachelor Girls" may vow to cut themselves off from the sterner sex; may band themselves into an organization to live apart from men, but there comes a time sooner or later when they "succumb" to masculine persuasion and "fall" for matrimony.

SCENE FROM MELIES "BACHELOR GIRLS."

Nora, in Melies coming release "The Cowboys and the Bachelor Girls," is the grand high lady of a flock of this species of femininity whose every effort is directed toward the successful upholding of their slogan—"Down with the men." She it is who watches over the daily lives of the girls to guard against the contamination of their hermitian atmosphere by the intrusion of man.

All the girls think it very good fortune when Nora receives news that she has been left a ranch out west by a deceased relative, for they will be able to migrate there and live in peace and solitude, free from man at last.

No sooner do they reach the country railway station, however, than several native cowboys who happen to be thereabout, decide that it is just about time they take unto themselves wives. And what better time than the present, with this sudden influx of eastern stock! But the girls will have nothing to do with them and spurn their offer of services.

"All's fair in love and war," so the boys resort to tricks. Two of the girls out riding are attacked by "desperados" when who should happen along but two of the boys, who rescue the young ladies. The trick works and they are allowed to accompany the latter home.

Two more of the bachelor girls are fishing when an apparently real live bear threatens them. Two more of the boys save them from "instant death" and likewise take them home.

Nora is the only one left. She is indignant at the outcome of affairs and resolves to leave the ranch, declaring she will have none of it. Fortunately for the other girls, Nora meets with a real desperado, a Mexican greaser with whom she has a thrilling struggle for life. The remaining one of the cowboys coming that way hears her cries and hurries to her rescue.

It is right here the leader of the bachelor girls renounces her allegiance to the club's principles and gives her heart to the leader of the cowboys. The two return to the ranch where they are cheered by the rest of the camp.

A $5,000 photoplay theatre has been erected in Montgomery, Ala., with H. C. Farley as manager.

Leopold Wempfheimer, of Driggs avenue and Newell street, Long Island City, N. Y., is planning to erect a photoplay theatre to cost $4,000.

Manager Smily, of the Pastime photoplay theatre, Madison, Me., has leased Hamilton Hall, in which he will put pictures.

Max Slavitt, of Haverhill, Mass., has begun remodeling his photoplay theatre on Washington street. The new improvements will cost between $8,000 and $10,000.

AN EDISON GROUP

A Political Feature Subject—Pilar-Morin in Pleasing Picture

POLITICS is such an interesting subject the wonder is that there is not more of it in pictures. The Edison players have ventured into the political field in a subject entitled "Through the Clouds," down for an early release, and have succeeded in developing a mighty interesting picture from a somewhat complicated plot, introducing as well the essentially modern mode of locomotion—the aeroplane.

According to the story, Jack Stanley, a birdman, is in love with the daughter of Judge Grey, the candidate for re-nomination for something or other. Opposed to him is Judge Russell. Young Stanley is turned down as the suitor for the hand of Judge Grey's daughter by the Judge himself, and determines to make good and win the girl, if possible.

A plot develops in which Russell schemes with a big contractor to defeat Grey, but in order to gain the contractor's support he is obliged to sign an agreement to give a certain state contract in payment. It is Stanley's good fortune to save from an automobile accident the maid who is in the employ of the scheming contractor, and through her aid he subsequently gains some important information vital to the interests of Judge Grey. It is in the transmission of this information from the distant works of the contractor to the convention hall that the aeroplane is put into use. It is a real aeroplane, too, not a property machine, and Jack Stanley is another name for one of the real "birdmen."

Stanley's plan to get away on the aeroplane is discovered and he has a fight with Russell's secretary for the machine. He wins and carries the message to the convention which insures the election of Judge Grey. Of course after that there is no chance for the Judge to make serious objections to the love making of the young folks and they get his blessing.

The picture is one of unusual interest. The action throughout is spirited and much real workaday life is injected into the various scenes. As a feature subject it should take the first rank among the Edison productions.

A DAUGHTER OF THE MINES.

Another of those delightful Edison Canadian pictures which are attracting considerable attention has to do with the mines near Victoria, B. C., and is entitled "A Daughter of the Mines." Several interesting views of mines are shown in the picture. The little love story is simplicity itself and a delightful comedy. The son of the superintendent of the mines falls in love with the very pretty daughter of a gruff old veteran miner. Both parents veto the suggestion that anything serious can be entertained by the young folks and both the lovers naturally resent the veto. An elopement takes place. The lovers make their getaway on a locomotive, going to the nearest town for the marriage ceremony.

When their respective fathers discover their elopement there is a considerable disturbance, but the matter is smoothed over in a most delightful manner when the newlyweds return to make their peace.

PILAR-MORIN IN THE GREATER LOVE.

Of the several pictures in which Mlle. Pilar-Morin has appeared, we doubt if she has done anything that shows to better advantage than her work in the coming Edison release entitled "The Greater Love."

As the daughter of a French peasant farmer, she is compelled to marry against her will, while in love with a promising young student. The husband this unfortunate girl is compelled to take, turns out to be a shiftless fellow and poverty overtakes them. In the course of events to protect her son, she is arrested for a crime and brought before the judge, who proves to be the lover of her youth. Compelled by law to send the woman to prison, the judge is deeply moved as he is unable to grant a pardon. When the woman is released from jail she eventually drifts to the doorstep of her old lover, the judge, who in the greatness of his love takes her into his home. The picture is replete with strong dramatic situations.

SCENE FROM "THROUGH THE CLOUDS."

SCENE FROM "THE GREATER LOVE."

ARMS AND THE WOMAN

Though the title does not indicate the character of this picture "Arms and the Woman" is really a good western subject of the hold-up type. A shiftless son, unwilling to earn money, seeks to steal it by engaging in a stage robbing exploit. His sister is on her way to deposit funds in the bank. Through the bravery and alertness of the stage driver, the attempted robbery is defeated; the chief robber killed and the accomplice brother badly wounded. Realizing the girl's distress at the plight of her brother the old driver cooks up a story to exonerate him and thus brings out a satisfactory ending. There is plenty of action and some very good scenic effects in this pictures.

NEW THEATRE FOR LONG ISLAND CITY.

Long Island City's first real theatre "The New Eden" at Vernon avenue and Fourth street, which opened Nov. 7, has brought to that well known Brooklyn suburb a new era in the line of theatricals and motion pictures. Formerly, Long Island City had always depended either on New York or Brooklyn for its theatricals, but it now begins to look as if Long Island Cityites will stick to home industries and both "The Great White Way" and "Trolley Dodgers" will have less calls for theatre seats from that section of Long Island in the future.

While the stage of the New Eden is large enough to accommodate the best musical and dramatic productions, at present first-class vaudeville and the latest motion pictures will be given. The house is fireproof in every respect, the picture machine being placed in a large roomy asbestos booth. The curtain is one of the latest improved for the use of showing pictures in the light, as it will be the policy of the management to have no dark house.

The New Eden is destined to have an effect on the business done by the Greenpoint theatre inasmuch as it will draw from a section that has been a stronghold for Brooklyn theatres.

O. T. CRAWFORD'S NEW UNION THEATRE.

A circuit of motion picture theatres is being planned by O. T. Crawford of St. Louis, Mo. So far there are three theatres in the list and twelve more are to be built.

The latest of the three theatres to be built was the "Union," at Union and Easton avenues, which was opened Saturday night, Nov. 5. This theatre is built entirely of concrete and was the most rapidly erected building of concrete ever put up in St. Louis. On September 1 the site was bare. In forty-six working days the building has been entirely completed, seats put in, painting and frescoing done, marble work placed and a stage built.

The building seats 1,400, 850 downstairs and 550 in the balcony. The price of admission will be 10 cents. Vaudeville and motion pictures will be given. Later Mr. Crawford contemplates giving musical comedies on a small scale in these theatres.

This theatre not only can be used in winter, but each side is made entirely of windows and all can be opened in summer, making the place as cool as an airdome.

Associated with Mr. Crawford in building the Union are J. T. Hagerman and Arthur Fitzsimmons. J. M. Dubbs is to be manager of the new show house.

The Savoy theatre, Atlantic City, N. J., has been purchased by Max Weinman, vice-president of the Marine Trust Co. The theatre ran motion pictures last summer.

Rodgers and Bourne are preparing to put in a photoplay theatre on the top floor of the new Paszter & Klar Building, Center street, Middleboro, Mass.

By James S McQuade

THE new factory of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, which has been under construction for some time, will be completed in about three weeks. The ground space occupied by the new structure is 60 by 100 feet, and the building is two stories high.

The first floor space will be occupied by mailing, shipping and type printing departments, the latter being specially designed to give better facilities to the department of publicity. On the second floor will be housed the perforating, film printing, developing, finishing and washing sections. The interior of the second story will be finished in white tile, excepting the finishing and developing rooms, which will be finished in dark tile. The building is thoroughly fire-proof and has been constructed so that a third story can be added later. It is the intention of Mr. Spoor, when need calls for it, to construct a new studio in this third story, but the present spacious studio, located on the ground floor in the old plant, will amply serve all purposes for some time to come.

Some weeks ago a new building, one story high and running 180 feet along the western limits of the Essanay grounds, with a depth of 35 feet, was completed. In this building are two warehouses and a large garage.

The cost of the new additions, when fully completed, will be about $50,000. The filtering system installed in the new factory will alone cost $3,000. This system is the very latest and best invented for the perfect cleansing of water, and its use, in connection with the film washing room of the Essanay plant, will ensure the best results, so far as the washing department is concerned. The new Blackstone hotel, this city, one of the best appointed in the country, is using the same system.

While gleaning these notes from George K. Spoor, he also informed me that Essanay's new eastern stock company, under the able direction of Harry McCrea Webster, is turning out negatives that will far excel in point of composition anything heretofore offered by the Essanay company from the Chicago plant. In addition to this, Mr. Spoor claims that the new photographic work done at the plant cannot fail to attract special attention and favorable comment.

Heretofore, that is before the purchase of the George K. Spoor Co. by the General Film Co., the general offices of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Co. have always been located at 435 North Clark street. In a short time they will be moved to a prominent location within the "Loop." Then, excepting the secretary and sales manager's, all the departments will be located at the Essanay plant, on Argyle street.

Mr. Spoor is highly pleased with the success of the film of the world's championship baseball series. It is taking like wild fire all over the country, and complimentary letters keep pouring into the office from all quarters. Here is a letter from the Star Theatre Co., of Houston, Tex.:

"Enclosed find clipping from today's Houston 'Post,' which will be of interest to you. The film certainly drew as well as the name of the makers. We did the business."

Following is the article in the clipping referred to:

WORLD'S SERIES AT THE STAR.

New Films are Clearest Seen in Many Years.

The world's series pictures will be exhibited again at the Star theatre today and for the last time. The Essanay films on the big series are the clearest of a world's championship seen in many years. Action pictures of baseball are generally poor, as the lightning rapidity of movement, tends to cloud the film. Of these films that is not true. Every action picture, whether of the diamond in part or the bird's-eye view of the whole is clear cut and plain. The individual pictures are naturally the most interesting. Garry Herrmann and Lynch, Chance, Davis, the members of both teams, separate groups of them, Ty Cobb with Ty, Jr., the presentation of the autos, the injured Evers in cordial conversation with the great Collins, the team mascots—all are shown. The pictures of the crowds and good views of the busy scribes in the press box show up well. The diamond views show that hard hitting featured the series. Several of Chicago's ineffectual attempts to pilfer second are clearly demonstrated.

At the Alcazar theatre, East Madison street, this city, where a first run of the film was presented on release day, that house did the largest business ever reached in its history. The owner, Mr. Seever, and Manager Talbot, both assured Mr. Spoor of that result. The film has also made an enormous hit in Canada.

Essanay's Western Company.

I also learned from Mr. Spoor that the Essanay western company moved to San Jose, Cal., during the week of Oct. 29, and that the first pictures will be due from that point about Saturday, Nov. 12. Several big western features may be expected shortly, I have been told.

Alliance and Sales Co. Still Apart.

The meeting in New York on Thursday, Nov. 3, between a committee appointed by the Alliance at Cleveland and the Sales Co., resulted in nothing, so far as a settlement of the main questions considered at the Cleveland meeting are concerned. In order to arrive at some conclusion, another meeting was arranged for Thursday, Nov. 10, in the Empire City. R. G. Bachman was the only member of the committee in attendance from Chicago.

On one point the Sales Co. came to an agreement with the Alliance; that was by admitting the American Film Manufacturing Co. to its selling organization, on the same basis as other "independent" manufacturing concerns.

Before and After.

In the "Moving Picture World," in its issue of Oct. 1, 1910, page 748, there appeared, under the general heading, "Comments on the Films," the following article:

"BERTIE'S ELOPEMENT" (Selig).—Here is a genuine elopement, the ladder placed against the castle wall, the emergence of the maid from the casement, the hurried flight, with the irate and objecting parent in hot pursuit, the arrival at the parson's, a hasty tying of the knot, and the appearance of the aforesaid irate father just too late to be of service. The fight was won and two was one, an apparent contradiction of terms, but in reality no difference from what might have been expected, and so they lived happily ever after.

In the same issue, on page 769, the Selig Polyscope Company's advertisement appeared.

In the same publication, dated Nov. 5, on page 1045, there appeared this article:

When "Bertie's Elopement" appeared on the screen there was no title, not even a sub-title. In this film it would have been better for the manufacturer to omit his trade mark, a diamond, as the production is no credit to him, and certain Independents do far better work. It is an old plot rehashed too many times, with nothing new and the details not taken care of. According to the story, the elopement is to take place in the dark of the night. One scene, the one of the ladder at the window, shows that it is night, but when the elopers reach the carriage it is bright daylight. Useless to call attention to the numerous blunders in this film, suffice to say that the young man, acting the part of the stern and obdurate father, looks more and dresses more like he was the brother of the girl or the chum of her sweetheart.

In the issue of Nov. 5, the advertisement of the Selig Polyscope did not appear, nor had it been inserted in several of the preceding issues.

The first article quoted was written by a member of the paper's New York staff; the second was contributed by its Chicago correspondent. I mention these facts so as to escape the charge of unfairness. The New York writer pronounces "Bertie's Elopement" a GENUINE elopement, the Chicago correspondent gives it as his opinion that the maker of the film should never have allowed his trade mark on it.

Which one of these two gentlemen is the goat?

Or to put it another way: What had the disappearance of the Selig advertisement to do with the critical faculties, assumed or real, of the Chicago correspondent?

But we must not blame him for following the policy of his paper.

American Film Service Protects Title.

Suit was recently filed by the American Film Service against the American Film Manufacturing Co., of this city, organized a short time ago, to enjoin the latter from using the word "American" in connection with "Film" in its title.

In the Superior Court, before Judge Dupuy, a motion for preliminary injunction will be made Thursday, Nov. 10.

On March 11, this year, the American Film Service of Chicago was granted a permanent injunction against the American Film Exchange ("independent"), of this city, enjoining the latter firm from using the word "American" with the word "Film" in its title. The order was issued on the date mentioned and the decree entered March 14. The permanent injunction, in part, reads as follows:

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that an injunction issue herein enjoining and restraining said defendants, Charles E. Pugh and James L. Reilly, their agents, employes and attorneys from conducting business under the name of the American Film Exchange, or any other name combining the word 'American' with the word 'Film.' The order was granted by Judge Dupuy in the Chancery Court.

The reputation gained by the American Film Service under that title has made said title a synonym for good quality film and fine service, etc., and I. VanRonkel, secretary and treasurer of the company, and his official colleagues, consider it a valuable asset of the firm.

There is a difference in the two suits, however, in that the former infringement on the title was made by people engaged in the film renting business, whereas the infringement claimed at present is against a company engaged in the film manufacturing business. It will be interesting to follow this case and ascertain if an injunction can be secured against an infringement of title when the alleged trespassers are not engaged in the same department of business as the complainants, although both are engaged in the same general line.

Adler & Lederer are of counsel for the American Film Service, and it was due to their able presentation and conduct of the former case that an injunction was granted.

Closing Sunday Shows in Chicago.

Ald. Theodore K. Long declared Nov. 5 that the ordinance closing Sunday shows, in an effort to stop scalping, would be pushed through the city council. It was he who made the motion for the preparation of the ordinance.

Other members of the license committee also asserted that their sincerity would be shown when the measure is called up in council meeting.

Howard W. Hayed, assistant corporation counsel, who is drafting the ordinance, said that it will be a simple legal proposition and that there is no question of the city's right to enact the law approved by the committee.

Managers of Loop theatres, on the other hand, call the action of the license committee a "bluff," and assert that the owners of nickel shows would save the big down town playhouses. Any alderman who voted for the proposed ordinance, they say, would be defeated at the next election.

At the same time the Loop managers express a willingness to see their houses closed on Sunday. They say they are willing to take a "day off" once a week.

"We would not be so strongly opposed to the plan as the aldermen seem to think," says Harry J. Powers, of the Powers theatre, "but I do not believe that they are considering seriously what they threaten to do. I am sure that before this every member of the council has had to listen to protests from one or more proprietors of the small theatres scattered throughout the city and to thousands of men, women and children whose Sunday recreation would suffer from such a step.

"We have been opposed to scalping for a long time. We place our tickets on sale in the hotels and we even have made an effort to stop that, but the visiting managers protested so vigorously that we had to put them back in the hotels.

"The council will not pass this ordinance. It would mean defeat for every alderman who voted for it."

There is no doubt that a tremendous rumpus would be raised by the passage of the ordinance mentioned, as Sunday is the only day that the working man can find time to take in the picture shows with his family.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyright by J. H. Hallberg.

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 11.—The constant potential transformer must have the lowest possible amount of magnetic leakage in order to maintain the voltage constant irrespective of the amount of load on its secondary.

In order to reduce the amount of magnetic leakage, the primary and secondary coils of a Constant Potential transformer should be mounted very close together or one on top of the other on the same core leg.

Next talk will further discuss the alternating current transformer.

Alternating Current Transformer (continued).

All modern constant potential transformers are usually made with two primary and two secondary coils, each coil having its terminals brought outside of the transformer case permitting the primary coils and secondary coils to be connected in series or parallel as may be required for different voltages and for either 2-wire or 3-wire system.

Figure 25 shows the four primary and four secondary terminals. Suppose each primary coil is wound for 1,000 volts and each secondary coil for 100 volts then if the connections are made as illustrated in Figure 26, the transformer may be operated on 1000-volt line to deliver 100 volts on the secondary, because the primary and secondary coils are now connected in parallel.

If the connections be made as illustrated in Figure 27 then the coils being connected in series the transformer would be adapted for operation on 2,000-volt line and to deliver 200 volts on the secondary. It is evident that by connecting the secondary as shown in Figure 26 and the primary as shown in 27, you would have a transformer adapted to operate on 2,000-volt primary to deliver 100 volts on the secondary because the primary coils are in series and the secondary coils in parallel.

Now we may go one step further and your attention is called to Figure 28 in which you find the two secondary coils connected in series, but the middle wire brought out from the transformer in which case the transformer would operate on 2000-volt line and on the secondary there would be available 100 volts between each of the outside wires and the "neutral" or middle wire and 200 volts between the two outside wires.

Throughout the country there are many different systems of distribution in use, and of these the three-wire system is perhaps the most complex and requires more care and judgment in its handling and installation. Referring to Figure 28 you have therewith illustrated a transformer reducing from a 2000-volt line to 3-wire 100 and 200-volt secondary. This transformer is usually mounted on a pole outside of the building where the primary wires are connected through two protecting fuses (usually mounted on the pole cross arm or made a part of the transformer itself) to the line wires. The three secondary terminals are then connected to the feed wires which go into the building, in fact in some instances the electric lighting company may place one transformer in the middle of a block where it is connected to the line wires, then the company will run three large wires along the block to which the three secondary terminals from the transformer are connected thus feeding the three main wires running along the street with current at 100 to 110 volts between the "neutral" or middle, and each outside wire, and 200 to 220 volts between the two outside wires. Where one transformer is installed for the service of a whole block or for several adjoining buildings it is evident that upon the regulation of this one transformer depends the constancy of the candle-power of all lamps connected to that particular transformer. It is the aim of all manufacturers of transformers to make the regulation as close as possible so that the voltage will be the same, irrespective of the number of lamps burning and the manufacturers have been very successful in accomplishing these results.

A far more difficult problem is to build one transformer with two secondary windings connected to a three-wire system as illustrated in Figure 28, which will maintain the same voltage on either side of the neutral wire irrespective of the number of lamps burning and the nature of the load represented by incandescent lamps, arc lamps, motors, etc. The three-wire system as illustrated in Figure 28 under normal conditions is a balanced system, that is, if the voltage between the outside wires is 200 the voltage between the neutral and each outside will be 100. Suppose we connect a motion picture arc lamp between the neutral and one outside wire and there are no other lamps on the opposite side of the system or at least only a comparatively small number of lamps, the side on which the M. P. lamp is connected may allow the voltage to drop to 90, but at the same time the voltage on the opposite side will go up to 110. This of course makes a fluctuation in the candle-power of the lamps and besides it makes the motion picture lamp burn dimmer than it ought to.

You realize that if this same transformer feeds a number of lamps in neighboring shops and establishments a big kick will be registered with the electric lighting company, due to the voltage fluctuation and consequent increase and decrease of candle-power of their lamps. This problem involves a careful system of balancing the load between the neutral and each outside wire of the three-wire system and it also requires a carefully designed and constructed transformer. This is one reason why it is always well to consult the electric lighting company's expert or other competent authority when laying out the electric installation especially when the three-wire system is used.

Summary.

All modern transformers are made with two primary and two secondary coils, the terminals of all coils being so arranged that the primary and secondary may be connected for either series or parallel operation, which permits the same transformer to operate on two different voltages on both primary and secondary for either two-wire or three-wire system.

When the three-wire system of electric distribution is employed great care should be exercised in balancing the load properly between the neutral and the outside wires so that the unbalancing of the voltage and consequent change in candle-power of the electric lamps will be reduced to a minimum.

In our next "Electrical Talk" we will discuss the Electrical Service for Buildings.

Vitagraph Night at the T. F. N.

It was Vitagraph night at the T. N. F. Theatre, Newkirk avenue and East Sixteenth street, Brooklyn, last Thursday night, Nov. 10. Nearly the entire evening was devoted to Vitagraph subjects, Manager Ben Little seeing that only the latest films were shown. From the applause that came from the audience it certainly looked as if the Vitagraph subjects reign supreme in that section of Greater New York.

In fact, the whole entertainment was a gale one, and in order that the audience should have something long to remember Mr. Maurice Costello, the well known Vitagraph actor, was present to meet the patrons of the house. George Touhey, a well known singer, sang "The Vitagraph Girl" song in a pleasing manner that he had the whole audience join in the chorus.

THE ESSANAY INDIAN HEAD ELECTRO.

A Novel Idea to Popularize the New Name "Photoplay."

The accompanying cut of the Essanay Indian Head is offered to exhibitors by the Essanay Company for programs or photographs to their theatres showing that they are some way using the new name "Photoplay" in their advertising.

The Essanay Company has previously received many requests for the Essanay Indian Head cut and many programs from exhibitors in all parts of the country have already been received. The Indian head can be used on programs or any other advertising. The cut is artistic and every exhibitor should avail himself of the opportunity to obtain one, at a nominal cost.

"THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR"

Finely Produced by Selig

JAS. S. McQUADE

ONE of the most ambitious efforts yet made by the Selig Company in the field of classic plays will be released on Thanksgiving Day, Thursday, Nov. 24. This is none other than the production in silent drama of "The Merry Wives of Windsor," that will ever remain the most interesting of Shakespeares plays.

It was written only for the purpose of introducing the popular character of Sir John Falstaff among new scenes and new situations. Tradition has it that Queen Elizabeth was so highly pleased with Sir John's character in the two parts of Henry IV.—where he is seen as the companion of riotous Prince Hal. (afterwards Henry V.), and where his mendacious boastfulness, egregious cowardice and great capacity for sack excite the keenest mirth—that she commanded Shakespeare to write another play in which Falstaff would appear as a gallant and lover. The play was to be finished and produced in fourteen days from the date of command, a literary feat which the best Shakespearean commentators believe that Shakespeare accomplished.

It is pretty certain that the first production of "The Merry Wives of Windsor" was made about 1599, before Queen Bess, and it is known that it first appeared in print in 1602. It is the only Shakespearean comedy in which the scenes are confined entirely to England and where the characters, with two exceptions, are taken from the English Middle class. It is also prized, apart from its dramatic value, because it affords a vivid picture of contemporary manners and customs in the reign of Queen Elizabeth (1558-1603).

"The Merry Wives of Windsor" has a special characteristic that, perhaps, better adapts it for reproduction as a picture drama than any other of Shakespeare's plays, and that is, it is a farce rather than a comedy. And it is a farce, not only because of the nature of its incidents, the chief of which are pronouncedly farcical, "but also because the characters, however distinct they may be, owe their individuality more to some peculiarity of manner of speech, than to the elaboration of their moral characteristics." And the writer of the passage just quoted also states: "'The Merry Wives of Windsor' will ever remain one of the most perfect specimens of that lighter kind of comedy, which, when treated by the hand of genius, we never can bring ourselves to call farce, though, strictly speaking, it may only deserve that title"—a view with which every Shakespearean lover will heartily coincide.

As the escapades of Falstaff form the great controlling motive and object of the play, and as it contains five acts, it will at once be seen that 1,000 feet of film can deal only with those escapades, and that the minor incidents and secondary stories must, of necessity, be omitted. The Selig producer has, therefore, omitted the love story of Fenton and Anne Page, and the passages at arms between Falstaff and Justice Shallow, and between Sir Hugh Evans and Doctor Caius, etc.

The first scene gives us an exterior view of the Garter Inn, in Windsor, where we catch sight of Mistress Page and Mistress Ford; the amorous Falstaff, attended by his old-time followers, Bardolph, Pistol and Nym, and his page Robin; also the ridiculously jealous Ford and other characters. We see the smiling. yearning face of the old battered knight. "in the waist two yards about," as he casts melting glances in the direction of the buxom matrons of Windsor, and we can guess the workings of his mind as he whispers to his followers.

Next we have an interior view of a room in the Garter and note the expedition with which Falstaff indites two love letters—one to Mistress Page and the other to Mistress Ford—using exactly the same words. Pistol and Nym are commanded to bear them to the ladies, but refuse, as their pouches are lean and they, like their master, dote on wine. Then the page, Robin, is instrusted with them and instructed to "sail like my pinnace to the golden shores." Forthwith we see Pistol and Nym chased out of the room by the infuriated knight, after which they immediately decide to acquaint Ford and Page with the designs of their former master.

The following scenes show the delivery of the letters to the ladies; the revelation of each to the other of Falstaff's effrontery, and the discovery that the letters are worded alike. "Let's be revenged on him; let's appoint him a meeting" is mutually agreed upon, and they select Mistress Quickly, servant of Doctor Caius, to bear a message from Mistress Ford to the "greasy knight," appointing a meeting with him at Ford's house between 10 and 11, when her husband is absent.

In the meantime Pistol and Nym have notified Ford and Page. The latter smiles at the news, having perfect confidence in his wife, but the former waxes jealous. In disguise, Ford visits Falstaff at the Garter and learns of the proposed meeting. The acting in this scene is spirited and realistic.

The ensuing scenes, leading up to the hiding of Sir John in a buck basket; the vain search by Ford, and the emptying of the knight into the muddy ditch at Datchetmead, "close by the Thames," tell the story delightfully. The characters are also well sustained and the action is snappy and brisk.

The working out of the details leading up to the second meeting at Ford's house is happily done in the film. The scene in the Garter showing Falstaff after his "water cure" is extremely visible. He drinks his first quart of sack and, whilst consuming that, orders the brewing of a bottle—two quarts more—philosophising meanwhile in this strain: "The water swells a man; and what a thing should I have been when I had been swelled!" A truly hideous image, the 72 inches of waist circumference being recalled!

No one can look on that second escape from Ford's house, as shown in this film, without enjoying one of the heartiest Thanksgiving laughs indulged in for many a year. Again is the fat knight perplexed and mortified to find that Mistress Page once more interrupts his tete-a-tete with Mrs. Ford. And, as he hears from his hiding place behind the arras that Ford and a company of followers are at the door ready to rend him, should he be discovered, he rushes out and places himself in the hands of the "merry wives," who once more have put him in the toils.

"No more i' the basket," we can see him say, by gesture, as he is directed to it as a means of escape, and his mighty mass shivers as he recalls the former ducking. Then we see him rushed upstairs to don the garb of "the fat woman of Brentford," while the enraged Ford and his company come thundering into the room just vacated. And then, as he appears in his disguise, and Ford, learning from his wife that it is her "maid's aunt of Brentford," who has been forbidden the house on risk of a beating, the unlucky Falstaff is belabored as he flees, and is seen rushing madly out of doors with the whole pack at his heels.

The meeting at Herne's oak, in Windsor Park, the final humiliation, plotted this time by Mistress Ford and Mistress Page, with full knowledge of their husbands, is finely pictured. The midnight scene, with elves and goblins and fairies dancing in the shadows forms a fitting climax to this great subject.

When such great care and nice discretion have been shown throughout this film in the matter of costumes, in the building of scenery, and in the selection of furniture, it almost seems hypocritical to refer to the error made in showing Falstaff with the head of an ass in the Windsor forest scene. Mistress Page in Scene IV., Act IV., refers to the "old tale" that "sometime a keeper here in Windsor forest, doth all the winter time, at still midnight, walk round about an oak, with great ragg'd horns, etc."; and Mistress Ford, in the same scene, says: "Marry, this is our device; that Falstaff at that oak shall meet with us, disguised like Herne, with huge horns on his head." And so it was agreed.

Again in Act V., Scene V., Falstaff, after meeting Mistress Ford at the appointed place in the forest, and being informed of the presence of Mistress Page, says: "Divide me like a bribed buck, each a haunch; I will keep my sides to myself, my shoulders for the fellow of this walk, and my horns I bequeath to your husbands." And later on, in the same scene, the following directions are clearly given: "The fairies run away. Falstaff pulls off his buck's head and rises." It is thus evident that a buck's head, well horned, should be used.

The use of another property, the modern, parallelopippedonic clothes basket, for a buck basket—the receptacle in which Falstaff made his first get-away, is an oversight. The buck basket had the form of a truncated cone, the diameter of the top being somewhat larger than that of the bottom, and the depth quite considerable. The text, in Act III., Scene I., where Falstaff is describing to Ford, disguised as Master Brook, his experience in the buck basket, reads: "Compass'd, like a good bilbo, in the circumference of a peck, hilt to point, heel to head." The bucket basket was used only for soiled linen.

I believe that students of Shakespeare's plays everywhere will find much delight in this film, and that picture theater-goers generally will enjoy hugely the light, mirthful comedy so excellently mirrored.

Don't forget the release date—Thanksgiving Day.

SELIG PRESENTS JUDGE WILLIS BROWN

Humaniculturist.

IN a great film story entitled "The City of Boys," Judge Willis Brown is continually doing things. He is working out the science of Humaniculture. He is dealing with the problem of Child development from fundamentals rather than sentimentality.

He fixed a reputation in organizing the Anti-Cigarette forces resulting the prohibitive and strongest legislation against this evil in various states. His appeals throughout the public schools of the lands wherein he personally enlisted over a million boys in the American Anti-Cigarette League is still fresh in the minds of the public. His study, development and administration of the Juvenile Court jurisprudence placed his state of Utah in the very forerank of all states in this department of official child saving until now what is known as the Utah system as administered under a separate and distinct Juvenile Court of the state is a known fixed example for the country. The constructive organizations and institutions which he has founded to keep children out of the courts and reformatories of punishment have been so successful, has made him a recognized expert authority. His marvelous conception and conduct of the national Boy City—a school of civics, attracting thousands of boys and students each year to a given place where an actual Boy government is conducted—has made his name world wide. But nothing this young man has done has proved his marvelous genius and understanding of this question as his conduct of what the judge chooses to call his Humanifactory—an experiment station for the development of the human soul.

During the past two years Judge Brown has secured from the jails and penitentiaries, boys who are branded by heredity, jail life, vicious and criminal parentage, dead souls and sick bodies, boys whom nobody wants, who are unattractive, ofttimes repulsive and called degenerate—these he has taken first in his own home and later, because of numbers, in their own special home where under expert treatment these boys from the scrap heaps of civilization are developing into splendid American boys. Judge Brown has done this alone and unaided from the income of his lectures and so continues to do. The magazines and daily press have given and are publishing enough about Judge Brown and his work to satisfy further interest in this genius of the children's world. Judge Brown is the president of the National Juvenile.

A Prophet With Honor in His Own Country.

The history of Judge Willis Brown's work in the state of Utah and the testimony to his marvelous genius in devising the Juvenile Court laws, establishing the court, inaugurating three new institutions, and conducting the court during the first years of its life until it became a fixed, permanent and well understood institution covering the entire state, and making Utah known as having the highest type of juvenile jurisprudence, has brought this young man the love and confidence of the best in the community in which he has lived and strived and carved out his conceptions of a jurisprudence and of activities which prevent rather than punish and which exemplify love rather than justice.

When Judge Brown went to Salt Lake children were being arraigned for petty offenses in the same dock with hardened criminals. There was a cell in the filthy city jail marked "for juveniles." Boys and girls were sent indiscriminately to the reform school and branded for life as unfit for good association when they were not essentially wicked or vicious; the percentage of the saved was infinitesimal, the permanently damned was awful. This was the situation when Judge Brown came and began his talks to the boys and it takes no long memory to recall how the boys rallied to his support, nor does it take any acute observation to discover that the cigaret evil has been almost entirely abolished among the boys of the community. There have been no more cases where boys have been imprisoned with hardened criminals. The man who used to sell cigarettes or liquor to boys has found it unprofitable as well as dangerous; instead of regarding the law and courts with terror the wayward youngsters have learned to know the judge as a refuge when they are tempted, a friend when they are in trouble, and to recognize their own obligation to observe the law and enforce it. Waiving any question of moral values, the Juvenile Court has been the best investment the city or state has ever made and the returns are due to the judge who has managed it. Every principal in the public schools has declared the value of the court under Judge Brown's administration. Every man, woman and child who has had occasion to see the workings of the court, knows it is a powerful agency for the moral uplift of childhood of the whole community.

"The City of Boys" will be a special release and from every indication the demand for the subject will be extraordinary—already letters are pouring into the Selig offices, inquiring as regards the date of release and advertising matter of which there is an unlimited variety of both large and small.

WASHINGTON TIMES INVESTIGATION

Report of Judge W. H. De Lacy of Juvenile Court and Capt. J. F. Oyster, of Board of Education.

By CAPT. JAMES F. OYSTER.

Motion picture melodramas that are based upon immoral suggestions, notwithstanding they may point out a moral, are dangerous for the child. They may not produce harmful results upon some temperaments, but, as a general rule, the minds of the young are apt to be more impressed and fascinated by the evil suggestion than by a depiction of what are the consequences of evil.

To illustrate the point, many films are displayed showing the disastrous effects of intoxication. The moral is plain enough to an adult. It may be equally as plain to a child, but the feature that is likely to impress him most is the glowing hilarious scenes leading up to the consequences of the intoxication.

Pictures which may not be objectionable for grown-ups may be entirely improper for children. The fault has been that the officials of the motion picture houses and parents have not generally taken into account the extremely impressionistic qualities of a child's mind. Evil impressions, supplemented by all of the morals in the world, could never be of any good. They may produce dire results, and frequently do.

For this reason, principally, I am in favor of censorship of motion picture houses. As to what form it should take I am in doubt. There are arguments in favor of a censorship board having police power, but I am not so sure but that a purely unofficial board, exerting a moral influence, might accomplish a great deal.

Once they are so strictly censored that no trace of a criminal suggestion can be found in them, it is my belief that motion pictures can never be accused of having afforded the stimulus for youthful crimes, such as hold-ups and even murders. The cheap, melodramatic picture and the dime novel should go, for in their effects they are practically equal to each other.

Outside of passing upon the class of pictures to be shown I would be in favor of a censorship board which would look after and help regulate other features. Ventilation is one of the most important of these.

After visiting a number of Washington's representative motion picture resorts, I am confident that, for the most part, they are fairly well ventilated and that the managements are doing everything within their power to improve conditions along this line. But it is a matter of such vital importance that the safety of the public should not be relegated entirely to the disposition of the managements in the matter. A board of censorship could justify its existence if it safeguarded no other interest than this.

One thing that impresses me is the need for gas as well as electric lights in the various picture houses. When the electric current is cut off during a performance, as sometimes happens, it means usually that a house crowded with people is left in total darkness. Such a condition might easily lead to a stampede. For instance, if the lights went out at an exciting point in the display of the picture, it might start children crying, which, in turn, would startle others, who might think that the trouble was more than the mere going out of the lights. Under such circumstances a rush for the exits would not be unlikely, and women and children might be trampled to death.

The question of whether the lights used are injurious to the eyes should be thoroughly investigated, and, in fact, the whole question of lights should constantly be considered by persons competent to do so.

Washington should congratulate herself on her motion picture houses. While there is much about them that may be improved upon, and should be, they could be much worse managed than they are, and exert a less healthful influence. There is evidently a general desire on the part of the managements to exhibit as many educational films as would be practical, and this is a feature that, in my opinion, cannot be commended too highly.

The motion picture houses, judging from the appearance of their audiences are stimulating family ties and bringing about more family companionship. The father, who formerly spent his evenings in a saloon, now finds his recreation at the motion picture show, where he is joined by his wife and children.

Evidently this form of amusement has come to stay. It has developed for the most part along right lines, and in the absence of strict regulation. For this reason, I am not in favor of too stringent supervision, for, with the disposition that is now shown on the part of the managements, I believe that the more undesirable features would in time right themselves. But a supervisory board will bring about the reforms needed more quickly, and assure their permanency. There should be no further delay in organizing such a board, so that the motion picture house may become the factor for good it is capable of in every city and community.

By JUDGE WM. H. DE LACY.

Recent cases which have come under my jurisdiction convince me that the worst feature of the present methods employed by motion picture houses is the display of pictures in a darkened room.

This with other features, almost equally dangerous, must be abolished, else, in my opinion, the motion picture house can never become a force for good in any community. It is imperative that there should be censorship of such institutions as long as we have them with us.

The creation of a national unofficial board of censorship, supplemented by city and municipal boards, the latter clothed with police power, appeals to me as being probably the most practical solution of how to effectively regulate the motion picture house.

The local boards should not be too large, but should have authority to make and enforce all regulations thought to be necessary. I would suggest as the persons best fitted to constitute the local boards the chief of police, judge of the juvenile court, and superintendent of education.

On the other hand, the national board should be a large one and should be composed of scholarly men and women who would have sufficient time to go thoroughly into the whole subject of regulation and control, and give the benefit of their investigations to the local boards. In this way a co-operation could be brought about which should be productive of the best results.

I do not wish to attack the motion picture houses. There are many good features about them. Eventually, I hope they may be developed into institutions where the pictures will be supplemented by good music and the production of classical dramas.

But, as now constituted, they are in need of strict censorship. The pictures themselves are not generally reprehensible, although occasionally so. It is the atmosphere of loose familiarity in which the audiences seem to find themselves that produces the most harmful results.

The custom of displaying pictures in a darkened room can have anything but a moral influence. Scientists have demonstrated that they may be shown as easily in a lighted hall. A censorship board could more than justify its existence by adjusting this feature so that it will be devoid of its immoral tendencies.

In addition to the darkened room, the patronizing of shows by young girls unattended, the practice of many mothers of keeping young children up late attending the performances, and the cheap price of admission which, sometimes, causes an overindulgence and, therefore, adds to the difficulties of the poor, are among the more serious problems which have been ushered in with the motion picture house. All of these features could be greatly improved upon, if not practically eliminated, through the efforts of censorship boards.

As to the attending of shows by young girls, unescorted, the fault here, of course, lies largely with the parents. It frequently is the maudlin, sentimental pictures shown that lead to the forming of undesirable acquaintances with the young Lotharios who usually may be found loitering on the outside of the motion picture houses.

Public sentiment, properly developed and directed, may do much to eliminate this condition, and a censorship board might easily organize an educational campaign in the interest of such public sentiment.

It is hardly fair to blame the motion picture resorts, when mothers keep young children up late at nights attending the performances. Yet they are directly responsible for the loss of much sleep which children should have. The mothers should have recreation, but it should not be at the expense of the health of the child, because there is a show house next door or in the next block, and the price of admission is only 5 cents.

I am convinced that the cheap price of admission leads in many instances to reckless expenditure. There is no little problem involved as to what extent the motion picture house is adding to the burdens of the poor. It can scarcely be doubted, however, that the cheap amusement resort is cutting down the profit of the saloons, and, though it may contribute to the burdens of the poor, it is reducing other harmful results.

As a general proposition, I should say that Washington's motion-picture houses are superior to what they were two years ago. The sanitary condition of most of them is exceptionally good, and there is abundant proof that the managements are desirous of showing clean pictures.

Many of the films are decidedly instructive and well worth seeing. There should be effective censorship of all pictures displayed, and when this is secured, along with the improvement of other features, motion-picture houses will play an important part in the educational and social life of cities.

Feature Comedy Drama by Essanay

"The Tie That Binds" a Strong Production

RELEASED Nov. 29th, the Essanay Company's "Tie That Binds" will be found one of the most imposing of this firm's recent Tuesday releases. Many complimentary letters from exhibitors have praised the work of the new Essanay Chicago stock company, which now numbers twenty-one people, and is composed of actors who have had no little fame in the theatrical world.

"The Tie That Binds" is a comedy-drama, a story with a serious theme, happily imbued with a spirit of humor of a style which is characteristic of the Essanay's best work. The acting, also, is said to be of a very high quality, while the photography is of a correspondingly superior standard.

Miss May B. Nice, so the story runs, through an odd accident, meets young Will Grow, a star reporter on a city daily, and though neither of them press the advantage offered to make an acquaintance, both have been duly infatuated.

In the meantime May's father and mother have quarreled, and when Mrs. Nice finds the photograph of an actress in her husband's pocket she is enraged and announces that she will immediately take steps to obtain a divorce. The millionaire's protests and appeals fall on deaf ears, and Mrs. Nice hurries sobbing from the room.

Mrs. Nice goes to her sister's where she relates the story of her husband's awful duplicity. From there she visits the office of her lawyer, states her case and makes known that she wants a separation.

The scene changes to the newspaper office where Grow, the reporter, learns of the contemplated suit for divorce by Mrs. Nice. With instructions to "get the story," from his chief, Will is sent to the Nice mansion, where a dozen or more reporters from other papers have gathered, but fails to gain an admittance.

However, undaunted by a first failure, he searches for a scheme by which he can gain admittance to the Nice home. An opportunity comes when a drunken paper hanger, who has been employed in the Nice household, is discharged by his employer, and Will, averring that he is an expert paper hanger, is given the position.

He makes a bad botch of the paper hanging, but obtains the gist of the story when he overhears a conversation between Mr. Nice and his attorney. Will is taking notes when May enters. The two recognize each other and Will is finally forced to confess that he is a reporter.

Despite the girl's pleadings and the father's threats, Will declares he will publish the story and immediately takes off his overalls and goes to the newspaper office.

May despairingly seeks some plan to bring her father and mother together and thus stave off the unwelcome publicity which will result if Will's story is published. May learns that her mother has gone to her aunt's and immediately she hastens there. It is not long before the mother is convinced that she acted hastily and is willing to forgive her husband.

An hour later Will, who has deeply regretted the necessity of printing the story, receives the following note:

"I have succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation and so no use for your story. Come to the house at once. MAY B. NICE."

Later Will learns that, though he has lost a good story, he has won the love of May, and the photoplay ends with the wife and husband happily reunitel and their daughter and her lover plighting their troth.

SCENES FROM ESSANAY SUBJECT "THE TIE THAT BINDS."

BASEBALL FILM PROVES BIG HIT.

Essanay's World's Series Pictures Continue to Draw Big Crowds at All Houses.

The Essanay Company's "World's Championship Baseball Series of 1910" film has met with unusual success and daily continues to show to pleased audiences. Many letters from exhibitors all over the country have been received by the Essanay Company and all have been most complimentary and full of praise for this big sporting film. Although it was thought that the "1909 series" pictures, which were shown in all parts of the world, had broken the records for popularity, the recent picture by the Essanay Company has even eclipsed the success of the two baseball films previously issued.

A novelty advertising feature, which was recently adopted by a Michigan exhibitor, shows how highly valued this film has been to the exhibitors. Mr. E. D. Caster, owner of the Swastika Photoplay, in Benton Harbor, Michigan, arranged for the film for two days last week. Little opportunity was given for any advance advertising, but when Mr. Caster learned that he would obtain the film he hired a brass band and constructed a handsome float and met the film at the station, as though it were some important personage arriving in the city. It was placed on the float, and with the brass band blaring a "welcome to our city," the film was hauled to the theatre, where it was later exhibited. The novelty of the scheme awakened a lively interest with the Benton Harbor people, and needless to say Mr. Caster played to overflowing houses during the two days that the film was on exhibition.

PICTURES DRAW WELL IN NEWARK

Between Two and Three Million Attend Photoplay Theatres Yearly—Many New Houses Being Erected

According to the number of admissions issued in Newark, N. J., it is estimated that between two and three million persons have attended, within a year, the five photoplay theatres in Newark owned by Henry Robrecht, not including the Ideal, at 425 Broad street, near the D. L. and W. bridge over Broad street, in which has been installed an electric concert organ, made abroad, and the like of which is not in this state, says the manager.

This musical machine is almost equivalent to perpetual music, it seems, according to the description. Six rolls of music, each containing from one to six selections, can be installed at one time, and once the organ is started it will play the whole repertoire and repeat until stopped. Manager Robrecht plans to have some of the standard operas rendered as well as popular music. This theatre seats 300 persons and will be devoted exclusively to high class motion pictures, the films being changed daily.

One feature of the motion picture machines installed, which include some devices after plans by Mr. Robrecht, is the contrivance for showing dissolving views. This will be used for travel views. The picture machine room is fireproof. The theatre has two entrances, Broad and Plane streets.

NEW HOUSE HANGS S. R. O. SIGN.

The Monticello Theatre, at Harrison and Communipaw avenues, Hoboken, N. J., has not only had to use the S. R. O. sign, but go still further and stop selling tickets on each evening since the theatre opened its doors to the public last week. That the people are pleased to have in their neighborhood such a complete, cosy and attractive theatre, is manifested in the interest they have already shown.

The program for the week is being thoroughly enjoyed by the large audiences. On the opening night when the orchestra played the "Star Spangled Banner," the entire audience standing, it was fully realized that the long looked for event had arrived. The motion pictures are the best and latest to be had.

Problems of the Photoplay Operator Discussed and Questions Answered

Edited by Will C. Smith

Schenectady, N. Y., writes: For some time past we have been using a rheostat in multiples on 104 volt A. C., but have decided to put in a Mercury Arc Rectifier and I would like to know something about it. Can you give me any information?

Answer—All we can tell you about a Mercury Arc Rectifier is that it transforms Alternating Current into Direct Current, and it operates as follows: In the first place it is not attached directly to the street mains, but behind a transformer, working on the secondary circuit. There is a large glass bulb with two wings sticking out on either side, near the bottom, to each of which the alternating wires are attached. At the bottom is a short tube in which is a small quantity of mercury. Near it, also pointing downward, is another short tube containing mercury. By tipping the tube, or bulb, slightly an electric arc is sprung between these two bodies of mercury and this arc creates a mercury vapor which fills the whole bulb, acting as a sort of conductor for the main current which enters through the two side wings, passing down and out of the bottom mercury tube, to which is attached the negative lamp wire. As has been stated, alternating current flows first in one direction and then in the other, changing direction 120 times per second in a 60-cycle current. When the current direction is towards the left hand wing (called an anoid) it enters and passes to the lamp as indicated above, but when the direction of the current is reversed it cannot flow up and out by reason of the excessive resistance. The opposite wing (anoid), however, is connected to the other wire of the circuit and when the direction changes the current in that wire is then flowing towards that wing and passes through to the lamp just as it did on the other side, but it will be noted that this brings the direction of current flow through the mercury tube always in one direction. This is the principle the machine works on. There are other important details concerning reactance which maintains the arc during the instant of time in which the direction of current movement is reversed.

Finley, O., writes, asking my advice concerning screen. He says he is convinced that next to the Mirror Screen a plastered wall is best for picture projection, but for the reason that he cannot afford a Mirror Screen and the place is not built so he can use the wall, he would like to know the next best thing to do to get good results on the screen.

Answer: My advice would be to try the placing of a black cloth back of your screen, and in that way you would get the benefit of all the light on the screen. Have suggested this to several people and they have all tried it and write me that it helps the picture wonderfully. You put the black cloth right up against your white screen and stretch it just as tight as you have your white screen. Try it and I am sure you will be more than delighted with the results, and, if so, would be very pleased to hear from you.

Corona, L. I., writes: We notice that when any printing appears that the outside of our picture is good and sharp, but the center is out of focus, and when we focus the center up we find that the outside of the picture is out of focus. Can you let us know how to remedy this?

Answer—From the way your letter reads, I should say your lens is at fault. There is a possibility of your lens having a little oil on it, which would naturally make your picture blurred. Still, you say that when you focus your center, and taking it for granted you get the center sharp, the outside of your picture is then out of focus, why the lens being dirty would not make any material difference. So, under those conditions, I would say that you have a bad lens. However, it might be (and it is possible) that your aperture plate or your tension springs are worn to such an extent that your film does not travel evenly as it should; that is, the film does not BEAR SQUARE on the TRACKS, and this will cause your film to buckle in or out as it passes the aperture plate. I would suggest putting a new aperture plate and a new pair of tension springs on, and if this does not remedy it I would suggest that you try a new lens. There are several good makes on the market, and if you will write me personally I will give you the names of several manufacturers who make a specialty of moving picture projection lenses. It does not pay to buy cheap projecting lenses.

Wausau, Wis., writes: I am using a Power's No. 5 Machine and my picture will not stay in frame. The films keep continually jumping off the lower sprocket. The sporcket is a new one. Have set the roller back as far as possible; in fact, every way I can, and yet it will not stay on. Also, my picture I cannot keep in frame, and when the framing carriage is about one-half inch from the top the machine grinds awful. When it is raised or lowered it runs smooth as can be.

Answer—I take it that your frame-up lever keeps working up as the machine runs. At the left, just below and behind the take-up sprocket, the driving gear passes over the casting and forms a fulcrum at the frame-up lever, you will find a small bolt with a wing nut. Tighten this wing nut. If the bolt turns as you turn the wing nut hold it with a screw-driver, as its head is slotted for that purpose. If the wing in the nut won't pass the gear when you turn it remove the gear by loosing the set screw in the sprocket and slipping off. Take wing nut off and file wings until they will pass. As to the lower loop set your take-up sprocket in line with your intermittent sprocket so that the teeth on either side will be equi-distance from the straight edge as you lay your film against the two-aperture plate tracks. Then the set screw provided raises the take-up sprocket (idler) away from the sprocket and KEEP IT THAT WAY. After carrying these instructions out you should have no more trouble with your films jumping off your sprocket. Now, as to the grind, the coupling bar of the toggle joint on left of machine is worn out. This throws the gears out of proper relation to each other at a certain point in the travel of the frame-up carriage. Would suggest that you get a new toggle joint. I think I have pointed out to you the remedy wanted, and I am sure if you will try same your troubles will be at an end. I might add that too tight a take-up tension will have the tendency to pull your film off the lower take-up sprocket. Therefore, only have take-up tension tight enough to take up the film. Would like to hear further from you.

Condensers.

G. H. D., Boston, Mass., writes: I am giving about a 12x12 picture at 90 ft., with a Double Lantern, and I find that I have yellow corners. Have tried putting the thin condenser nearest the light and also tried putting the thick condenser nearest the light, but with no success. Can you help me out and let me know what size condensers I should use?

Answer—You, no doubt, are using one 6½-in. condenser and one 7½-in. condenser and that accounts for the yellow edges in throwing a picture the distance you state, namely 90 ft. You will find that after putting your lamp (arc) as near the condenser as possible you get poor results. What you want is two 8-in. condensers. Try this and you will find that you will get a good clear field. If this does not help you out try two 7½-in. condensers, but from my experience with Double Lanterns I think that two 8-in. condensers give a very good field at 90 ft., and for the size picture you want to give. Would like to hear further from you as to what success you have.

Single Pole Switches.

Newburgh, N. Y., writes: May I ask one question—Is there any reason why it is not just as effective to use a single pole switch, cutting but one wire of the circuit instead of both?

Answer.---There is, especially for motion picture work. In the first place, while a single pole switch would break the circuit and put out the light, it would not stop leakage through the ground did there happen to be one. Moreover the whole circuit would remain charged at the potential line, and in making repairs one would always be liable to shock, so under all circumstances the double pole switch should be used, especially for motion pictures, never the single pole switch.

Warning to Operators.

As we are going to press we are advised that the Operators holding the 1910 cards with the following numbers, 634, 761, 940, 808 and 349, will be taken up as soon as located. We would advise all Operators holding the above numbers to get in communication with the writer at once.

New Operators' Association.

The writer was called upon recently by a committee of motion picture operators representing the Moving Picture Operators' Benevolent Association of Greater New York, and asked if he would mention in his columns in The Film Index something about their Association. As I was just about to leave town it was impossible to give this committee much of my time just then, much to my regret, but I promised to give them more of my time upon my return to New York City. During the short space of time it was possible for me to give to the committee I gathered, however, that the Moving Picture Operators' Association was organized on Friday evening, Nov. 4, 1910, and held their first meeting at Schussles' Hall, New York City, and that Robert Goldblat was elected Temporary Chairman; Mr. McVey, Temporary Secretary, and Henry Wineberg, Temporary Treasurer. The object of the forming of this Association was for the betterment of conditions and to have better harmony among the Operators and to compel every member to give more attention to his work, and in that way there will be better harmony between the Proprietors of Motion Picture Theatres and the Operators. The Association will accept all Operators holding 1910 cards of Greater New York and vicinity.

"DRUMSTICKS."—Married contrary to her father's wishes, the daughter is disowned by the father. She is now a widow with a little boy named Jack and, very much impoverished, she appeals to her father for aid; he refuses to help her and so informs her.

An old farmer on his way to market with several crates of poultry stops at the widow's home, asks for a drink of water, which is given him by Jack. The boy is very much attracted by the poultry and takes a particular liking to a little turkey, which the farmer gives to Jack as a present.

Jack is delighted with this little turkey, names him "Drumsticks," and makes a pet of him. There is nothing too good for the "turk," which grows under his master's care and attention to be as fine a specimen of gobbler as ever stood on two legs or sounded a "gobble-gobble."

Thanksgiving Day is drawing near, and "Drumsticks" is admired by all who see him. Unfortunately, he comes under the notice of the landlord when he calls on Jack's mother for the rent, which is overdue. Mrs. Pell cannot meet his demand for the money and he insists upon taking "Drumsticks" in payment for the rent.

Poor "Drumsticks" is sacrificed, plucked and dressed, and, while awaiting the arrival of the landlord, little Jack, who is heartbroken at the loss of his turkey friend, writes a note asking the person who gets "Drumsticks" for Thanksgiving dinner to write him (Jack Pell) if he is tender, attaches this note to one of "Drumstick's" legs, and the bird is carried away to the nearest market and placed on sale.

We little know what a day may bring forth, and what we lose one way may be made up in some other way. It so happens that Mrs. Pell's father buys the turkey and has it sent to his home. The hired girl finds Jack's note, shows it to Jack's grandfather, who at first feels resentful, but gradually thaws as he thinks of those of his own flesh and blood and with whom he has been so severe.

His whole manner changes; he gets into his overcoat, orders his horse and sleigh, puts "Drumsticks" into a basket and hurries to his daughter's home, asks her forgiveness and hugs her and her little boy, then points to "Drumsticks," asking them to come home and share the Thanksgiving dinner and make their home with him.

It does not take them long to get ready, and he takes them in his sleigh to his own fireside, where we see them seated around the table giving thanks and having a jolly time, while they feast on "Drumsticks." Little Jack cannot forget his pet, takes a little toy turkey which his grandfather has given him for a Thanksgiving present, and erects a little monument in loving memory of "Drumsticks," who gave him so much joy and was the means, after all, of bringing him and his mother so much happiness and good luck.

"A MODERN COURTSHIP."—Sue has a strong objection to marrying a bald-headed man, and when she discovers that her dear Jack has a small bald spot on the top of his head she is horrified and immediately dismisses him.

Being assured of incipient baldness by many of his friends, Jack secures some of the remedies recommended, applies them to the bare spot, and after a month sees that the baldness has extended, not to mention the odors with which the lotions are infested. "Bah!" He throws the stuff out of the window and vows it is no good.

The sound of the crashing glass has hardly died away, before a slick individual enters, displays and eulogizes a great hair restorative, "BALDY'S HAIR TONIC; Never Fails and Bound to Produce Results." Jack buys a bottle, applies the liquid regularly and finds at the end of the week he is balder than ever. ..A wig for mine," says Jack, and he gets one, a perfect fit and a perfect beauty. He meets the "Baldy Hair Tonic" man, who is delighted with the fine head of hair Jack has raised and attributes it to his tonic, insists upon Jack going to a photographer to record what can be done with the "Baldy Hair Tonic," and makes it worth Jack's while to sit for his portrait; it will make a great "ad." and business booster.

If he could fool the tonic man he can fool Sue, and she certainly will fall for the luxuriant hirsute exhibit. This is what he thinks. Sue fixes herself to receive him, ornamenting herself with a cluster of false curls to make herself more attractive.

Jack calls; he and Sue engage in a tete-a-tete. She sees his hair, is delighted, and fondly strokes his head, and he tenderly fondles her curls. Absorbed in love's reveries, she dislodges Jack's wig, grasps it, jumps up, pulling off her curls and leaving them in Jack's hand. Two of a kind; one on each. She calls it an even break, laughs, and they become re-engaged, sealing their reunion with an affectionate kiss.

"THE BUM AND THE BOMB."—A "bum" asleep at the fence outside a field where some boys are playing a game of football. They accidently kick the ball over the fence, landing it alongside of the "bum," who is greatly disturbed, thinking the ball a bomb and expecting it to explode and blow him to kingdom come. Assured of the harmlessness of the ball, he picks it up, struck with a happy idea; a ready help in time of need.

He goes to a saloon, where a party of boon companions are satisfying their thirst. He is looked upon as an intruder and they start to drive him from the place. He lifts the ball, which closely resembles a bomb. Everybody, including the bartender, vamooses, and leaves the tramp monarch of all he surveys. He proceeds quietly to help himself to what the others have left, and then makes his way to a restaurant.

He asks for a "hand-out," is refused by the proprietor, who quickly rushes from the establishment when he sees the "bum" attempt to light the bomb. The proprietor is soon followed by the customers, and "Weary Willie" sits down, partakes of a hearty meal, and is soon on his way again.

Hearing footsteps approaching, he turns around and sees a pursuing "cop." He starts "lippity-cut" down the street, chased by two policemen, the bartender and the rest of his previous acquaintances, greatly augmented by an ever-increasing crowd. Slam-bang into anybody and everybody he meets; a general mix-up, and still the chase goes on. Every turn brings a fresh laugh and funny complications. The bum finally gets a big start and peacefully stretches himself under a tree and quietly falls asleep—for a minute. The pursuers are upon him and he is led captive to jail, anticipating a six months' rest after his strenuous and busy day.

"FRANCESCA DI RIMINI."—It is a beautiful story simply and clearly told; it all happened in the thirteenth century. Francesca is the daughter of Guido da Polentia, the Lord of Ravenna, Italy. Lanciotto (the Lame), a hunchback of Rimini, becomes enamoured of Francesca, although he has never seen her. Her father secures her consent to marry Lanciotto, who sends his brother Paola, a handsome youth, to bring her to Rimini and arrange the nuptials.

Paola arriving at the court of Ravenna, Francesca thinks he is Lanciotto and falls in love with him at first sight, and he with her, but Paola controls his heart's desire by proving faithful to his brother's mission. When Francesca meets Lanciotto she is shocked at his ugliness, and cannot help making comparison with his attractive brother, whom she really loves and, in fact, shows her preference. Lanciotto sees it and knows the reason, but persists in his attentions and intentions, and, by the persuasion of her father, Francesca is married to Lanciotto.

Just after the marriage ceremony, before the bride and groom leave the magnificent cathedral with all its grand architecture, a messenger from the guards of the city rushes in and hands Lanciotto, who is captain of the soldiery, a message that he must join his army and be off to war. Ever faithful to the call of duty, Lanciotto takes his sword from the bearer of the message, gives Francesca over to the care of Paola during his absence, and hastily departs.

Pepe, the jester of the court, heartily dislikes Lanciotto, and readily sees the true state of affairs and never fails to mock and ridicule his crippled master. He is delighted when he learns that Francesca and Paola love each other, and is constantly on the "qui vive" for evidence of his suspicions. The lovers in the gorgeous gardens of Rimini are wrapped in love's sweet thoughts and rhapsody, and are irresistibly drawn in each other's embrace, kiss and stand transfixed.

Pepe, spying every movement of the couple, dashes from the place of hiding and hastens to Lanciotto's camp, running through the wood and glen like a maddened hound. This is a wonderful piece of acting and panoramic beauty. Pepe reaches Lanciotto's tent, informs him of his wife's and brother's unfaithfulness, only to meet the cripple's wrathful indignation and contempt. The shaft of venom has been sunk deep by Pepe into the heart of Lanciotto, urging him to mount his horse and gallop furiously in the midst of an approaching storm to his palace, there to learn the truth of the jester's report.

As the lightning flashes and the thunder roars, he reaches the portals of his home, throws aside the curtains and beholds his wife in the embrace of his brother. With terrible denunciations and uncontrolled anger he draws his dagger, raises it to kill, when a stroke of lightning, attracted by the glistening steel, glances from the dagger and strikes the two lovers dead. The climax is a conception of dramatic art, inspired genius, sustaining to the end what proves the par excellence of the Vitagraph "life portrayals."

It is without question a work of art in its every detail; between genius and talent there is the proportion of the whole to its parts, a most brilliant display of marvelous beauty, radiant with human interest.

BIOGRAPH CO.

"SUNSHINE SUE."—There is an invisible power always attendant upon the truly innocent. A guardian angel that leads the way from the many pitfalls that threaten the young before they are able to realize the enormity of one false step. The human is endowed with free will, but during youth there is always that power reasoning for us, and our future depends upon harkening to it. Sue is the sunshine of the old home; ever smiling, singing and lifting the burden from the shoulders of her parents in their declining years. She is beloved by Tom, an honest country lad, who is at a loss to know how to evince it, she too care free to understand. He was content to sit for hours and listen to her sing and play the old songs on the parlor organ. Fate seemed to be taking good care of affairs, until one day a summer boarder pays the homestead a visit. Good looking, easy of manner and the owner of an automobile, Sue feels quite elated when he pays her some attention. She readily consents to taking a ride with him, which meets the approval of her parents who look upon the young man as highly reputable. Ah! here is the time-honored trick of fate; the playing with fire, so often the beginning of the end. Some miles away from the village, the auto becomes conveniently disabled, and as it is assumed it will be some time before it is righted, the young man suggests that they go to the roadhouse nearby for rest and refreshments. So well entertained is she that the time flies swiftly and when she suggests returning home she is made to believe that it is too late to return home that night. Stunned at first by this intelligence, she awakens to the full realization of the situation and excluding the young man from the room, she passes the night alone in dreadful anxiety, for she imagines the disquietude her dear old folks are suffering. And rightly, too, for at dawn we see her poor old father with faithful Tom, after an all-night vigil at the front gate sorrowfully dragging himself up to the cottage door. The young man returns to Sue in the morning and persuades her to go with him to the city, promising to marry her upon arrival. To this she consents and he installs her in a furnished room while he ostensibly goes to make arrangements for their marriage. While he is away, she writes this news to her father. But, alas, the poor girl is later made to appreciate the cruel truth of the situation when the young man pretends his father objects to his marrying just at present. He, of course, reasons that she has gone too far to turn back. In fact, she fully realizes her awful predicament, for she knows how the world will regard her apparent indiscretion, so ashamed to return home, she seeks employment. In this direction she meets with the indignities often afforded the innocent by those human vultures who call themselves men. Her experience is enough to convince her of the falseness of the world she would enter, so back home she goes the same day to be received with open arms by her dear old daddy, whose searching gaze she has met with a smile.

"THE TROUBLESOME BABY."—Babies are usually considered Heaven's most precious gifts, but this particular infant was considered anything but precious to poor Martin during his limited sojourn at the seashore. Martin is hurriedly called to High Beach to close a contract for a big deal with the president of a Construction Company who is stopping there. He begs his wife to accompany him, but she pleads not having yet the new suit she has ordered, so he makes the trip alone intending not to stay any longer than necessary. Arriving there, he transacts his business at once and rushes to catch the next train out, missing it by a hair, which forces him to stop over several hours for the next. Meanwhile, Mrs. Martin has received her suit and follows her hubby on the next train. To while away the time, Martin takes a turn on the beach, taking a seat beside a lady with a baby in her arms, who, without looking up, thinks her husband is still occupying the seat and absent-mindedly places the baby in his arms while she runs after her other child. Well, you can see the trouble that is cooked up for Martin when he meets his wife. However, he gets rid of it after awhile, and when it gets back to its mother explanations bring peace.

"LOVE IN QUARANTINE."—The Order of Quarantine is doubtless the most repugnant fiat issued in any community or municipality, and yet it is necessary. However, in this case the order resulted most agreeably, and it would seem to have been especially ordained by Cupid, for it rounded out a very pretty romance. Harold and Edith are betrothed, but, as the course of true love never runs smooth, they quarrel. Edith leaves him at the gate in a huff, but "faint heart ne'er won fair lady," so he follows her into the house to find the doctor attending the maid, who, it transpires, is ill of a contagious disease. The doctor has telephoned the case to the Health Department so the house is quarantined at once and the peevish lovers are destined to stay under the same roof until the ban is raised. This elates Harold, but the worst is yet to come. They both must be vaccinated. Edith's mother plans to help things along by having Harold pretend illness to arouse Edith's sympathy. The scheme is working finely when Edith discovers the hoax. Still, the ice is broken and the lovers' quarrel is quashed.

"INTO THE JAWS OF DEATH."—It seems strange how little respect and honor is paid to the firemen in America in comparison with their heroic work. We seem to look upon them as a body of men that are merely hired to put out flames. True, they are, but what small amount of pay they receive for risking their lives almost every week, perhaps every day. Theirs is a work of heroism, bravery and of self-forgetfulness to save the lives of others and what little contribution to their heroism this Edison picture may bestow upon them is slight indeed compared to what the world at large owes them as a body of heroic workers. "Into the Jaws of Death" plainly shows us the warp and woof of the web of fate.

We are shown a young man bidding his sweetheart good-bye before leaving for the West to make his fame and fortune. His suit, however, is looked upon with disfavor by the girl's father; and scarcely has the young man gone a few weeks before her father is forcing the attentions of another young man upon her, Unable to endure the parental persuasion much longer without becoming a victim of her father's desire, the daughter writes her lover to come and take her away if he still loves her. By chance the letter falls into the hands of the father's chosen suiter and he deliberately destroys it. It never reaches its destination, no reply comes and broken-hearted the daughter succumbs to her father's wishes and marries the man of his choice. A few years later and they have sunk down in the social scale of life. The husband comes home one night under the influence of liquor and in his drunkenness the lamp is tipped over. A moment only and the room is in flames. The even clang, clang of the bell over the night clerk's desk at the fire station heralds the news to the waiting man and beast, the call to duty is sounded and forth on their errand of mercy speed the fire engine and its crew. A cry from the upper window shows that a woman is imprisoned in the flaming building. A fireman leaps at the call for help, through smoke and flames he reaches her, clasps her in his arms and as he does so the glare of the fire lights up her face and the lovers of the first part of the picture are locked in each others arms in a fond embrace. Safely back to the street he carries the woman he loves and then she remembers that her husband, the man who has deprived them both of so much happiness, is still in the building. A moment only, her brave lover hesitates, but, remembering his chief's motto, "Love or hate, but be a fireman," he dashes back into the flames and brings the man he hated most in the world back to the street; but too late. The flames have called another victim to its own—he is dead. The web of fate has sent its shuttle back and forth slowly but surely weaving its pattern of love and life, and two lovers are once again united in love and a happy future.

"THE TOYMAKER, THE DOLL AND THE DEVIL."—There is a maker of lay-figures, a gay old party who half falls in love with his own creations of pretty women and gay soubrettes. He has a son who follows in his footsteps in his desire to stand well with the fair sex always. Working in the shop is a young apprentice with ambitions for the stage and he is in love with an orphan ward of his employer, who is betrothed to the good-for-nothing son, much to her discomfort. The old man has built a wonderful soubrette figure which he feels it would be possible to imbue with life if he just knew how.

Then comes a fancy dress ball which all the town people attend. The old man and his son taking costumes from their own stock dress themselves up and join the revelry. The little ward has nothing to wear and cannot go, but the apprentice suddenly conceives the brilliant idea of borrowing the clothes from the beautiful soubrette figure, little larger than a big doll, and dressing his sweetheart in them. The young man borrows a suit which makes him look like Mephistopheles, and so it is quite within the range of possibility that the old man shall be deceived when he sees apparently his own creation at the ball accompanied by the devil. Rushing frantically from the hall he hastens home to see if it can be true. The young people have preceded him, but they have no time to resume their own clothes or restore the doll to its position, consequently, the only thing to do is for the girl to take the doll's place while the young man hides himself up the chimney. The old man and his son come in and try to induce the doll to again assume life and motion. They perform all sorts of tricks with her and the girl plays the part of the doll well enough to fool them utterly. Disgusted with their failure, they build a fire and decide to warm up a hot toddy to sooth their discouraged feelings. Of course the fire smokes out the young man above, but impersonating the Devil, he makes the doll live and dance for the old man on condition that he give his consent to the marriage of his ward to his apprentice. The old man and his son quarrel over this agreement and after the girl has put the clothes back upon the doll, the son returns and smashes the doll to atoms to get square with his father. In the evening the old man is called upon by his apprentice who demands the hand of his ward in marriage. When the old man refuses, the document, signed by himself, is flashed before him, and then the young man confesses the trick that he had played. He tells the old man that he impersonated the Devil, and (not knowing that the son is listening behind him) tells him that the girl, the ward, impersonated the doll. The son is horrified at the thought of having killed the girl he once loved, but the apprentice understanding the situation more thoroughly calls the girl from her own room and the young man apparently sees a miracle, the doll-girl which he has smashed, restored to life. In the joy at his escape from murder, he gladly relinquishes all claim to the hand of the ward, and insists upon his father making good his written word.

"THE STOLEN CLAIM."—If you should be so fortunate as to be a passenger bound for Vancouver and you should look out of the car windows of your train six miles this side of Field, you would see perched upon the edge of a cliff, one thousand five hundred feet above, the clear outlines of a silver mine hung upon the very rocks of this shear cliff and seeming to be perched upon the very edge of possibilities. A dangerous looking spot, a desperate looking place, an impossible looking location for either man or beast. The collection of sheds and machinery seems scarcely to be hung up there on this straight, bold mountain cliff. Yet it is there that this Edison motion picture was taken. There is no make believe here, the only thing that does not seem real is "how did they do it," which is the question you would ask if one could but see the location. This undoubtedly is a marvelous piece of enterprise and we feel assured the the spectators will appreciate its beauty when they have seen the picture.

The story deals with the love of a young doctor and the daughter of an old Professor of Mineralogy. A certain unclaimed mine has been left to the young man by his uncle. A false friend succeeds in securing the plans and location of the mine and persuades the old Professor to enter his scheme to cheat the rightful owner out of his claim. The facts are kept safely from the daughter who is in love with the real owner of the mine and she does not realize the truth until some months after she has been forced to marry the false friend and the truth is revealed to her by her former sweetheart. When out West he meets her father and the "friend" and accuses them of deliberately stealing his claim. But Justice takes care of its own, when an explosion occurs in the mine and the father is killed and her husband is badly injured. Medical aid is required at once. The girl in a wild ride reaches the nearest village twenty miles away and seeing the sign of a doctor on the door, she nervously knocks. It is opened—she finds herself face to face with the man she loves and whom her husband has so cruelly wronged. She has come to ask him to save the life of his worst enemy. Here the nobility of the man is revealed. She has asked for medical aid, he is the doctor. If the man dies, he may again regain the woman of his heart, but duty before everything and he goes with her and again, face to face the two men meet. With the calm, quiet precision of his profession he forces his enemy to do his bidding. He saves his life and then turns to the wife. Silently the two, this man and this woman look into each other's eyes and part. She sinks into her chair with a sob, a moan, realizing what she has missed in life. For days she watches beside the bed of the man who has deprived her of happiness. Weary with watching one night, she falls asleep. He is delirious. He rises from his couch and wanders back up to the deserted mine. A moment he pauses on the edge of the dizzy height, a cry from the woman startles him, a shriek and he is dashed to pieces one thousand five hundred feet below.

A pale, quiet, little woman dressed in black, stops at the doctor's door one day and leaves a note asking for forgiveness and a mining claim upon the doctor's table, then sadly turns to leave, but a strong hand touches her shoulder and she looks into the eyes of the man she loves and as she stretches her arms to a great cluster of flowers on the table and holds them to her breast, we realize that something new and sweet and true has come into both their lives.

"HIS SERGEANT'S STRIPES."—A young corporal in the United States Cavalry in the Black Hills is very much in love with a young ranchman's daughter who lives near the military barracks. He asks her to marry him and she promises to do so when he has won his third stripe, making him sergeant. It is not long before he receives an assignment from his superior officer to carry an important despatch to the Commanding General at Fort Darrow. In the successful fulfillment of his mission he would be promoted to the office of sergeant, secure his third stripe and his girl.

He meets his sweetheart and tells her of his dangerous and important errand. In telling it he is overheard by one of the hostile Indians who notifies others of the tribe, and they watch his every move, follow him when he starts and pursue him when he tries to escape. The young fellow finds it impossible to get away from them and, as instructed in case of danger, he burns the despatch, faithful to the performance of his duty rather than the preservation of his life.

The girl, feeling sure that the young soldier would become a sergeant and her husband, patiently and anxiously awaits his return. She sews the third stripe on his coat sleeve, anticipating his promotion, little knowing it would only bear witness to his honor while he lay silent in the grave.

He is killed by the red men who find his body but not the despatch—only the ashes of it. He has won his stripes and his girl, but has lost his life in his country's service.

The picture, besides the sentiments expressed, has a strong interest from a scenic standpoint, with its characteristic Indian costumes and bareback, bridleless riding, which keeps up a thrill of interest throughout the prevailing sympathy for the hero.

"GRATITUDE."—In the shadow of the Nevada Falls, we see John Morgan and his wife wending their way back to civilization with their trusty pack mule as their only companion. Disappointed in their search for gold they are returning heavy-hearted. When they have reached Glazier Point, they camp for the night. On awakening they find their burro has wandered off and they are left no aid in their journey, and soon find it necessary to discard the saddle as a cumbersome piece of luggage.

On the opposite side of the small lake, the Indian camp is plainly visible—rations are low and Brown decides to seek help from the Indians, and accordingly goes to their camp. Meeting Red Bird and her brother Yellow Breast, Brown is directed to the tepee of Red Bear, and he is successful in exchanging his gun for some meal. Brown returns to camp. Red Bear accidentally discharges his gun and wounds his squaw. He sends for aid to the white man, who gives help and nurses the squaw back to life. Red Bear in order to show his gratitude for the white man's kindness tells him of gold deposits near Mt. Shasta, and, leaving the prospector's wife with the squaw, hits the trail with Red Bear for the promised find.

Their ambitions are realized and after a period of some weeks they return to the camp and find that in their absence Gerald Winston, a prospector, had used every effort to entice Mrs. Morgan from the camp, but is repelled by the squaw who proves herself true to her benefactor and blocks the attempt of the unprincipled mine owner. All is happy in their reunion and proves the ever prevailing influence of gratitude even in the breasts of the much hated red skins.

"MR. FOUR FLUSH."—The story deals with the explanations Mr. Four Flush gives to his fellow club members (on being questioned on his return as to where he had been) about his wonderful experiences and adventures traveling in foreign lands.

We find Mr. Four Flush enwrapped in effusive smiles and weighing under a heavy load of importance. Arriving at his accustomed haunt the club, after an absence of six months, he is at once surrounded by a curious crowd, all eager to learn of the wonderful doings of Mr. Flush.

He asks for a globe of the world that he may be more accurate and convincing in his argument. Upon his departure it is clearly visible upon the countenances of his hearers that they have not fallen victim to his hypnotic bunk and have ideas of their

Just then some kind and indulgent scandal monger who has discovered the truth tells the club the real facts and reason for Flush's absence. The chesty rival of Muenchauser is soon confronted with the report and wilts before his accusers after being convinced that his vacation had been spent in jail, with the light exercise of juggling six pound hammers on large and inviting stones. He finishes on the water wagon—and the time-worn expression is visible on his face—Never Again!

"THE STREET PREACHER."—Florence Nixon engaged herself to Henry Martin because she thought he would quickly win a church in the city and take her away from the humdrum life of the country.

He was one of the most promising students of his class at the Divinity school and it was only natural to suppose that he would soon find a wealthy congregation. But Henry was an earnest and sincere man. He saw that he was needed upon the street more than in the pulpit and it was a shock to Florence when he wrote that upon his graduation he would become a city missionary. Instead of the mistress of a fashionable parsonage she would be the wife of a street preacher. Her castles in the air quickly vanished and without compunction she wrote to break the engagement and determined to win her own way in the big town. It was pretty much the same old story,. small pay, the unsatisfied longing for amusement the good looking young chap and the invitation to dinner. Meantime Martin had become a city missionary and one of his talks so impressed Florence that she urged Ransom to marry her. This he refused to do, but the preacher touched his heart and he went back to Florence to tell her that he would right his wrong. He found her staring at a revolver. She had decided to make away with herself. Ransom took the weapon from her and sent the maid for the minister who so worked upon his feelings. It was Martin, married to Florence's chum and Florence had good reason for being glad that he chose the vocation of street preacher.

"RIGHT IN FRONT OF FATHER."—Betty's father was a deacon in the church and so was Rob's. They both belonged to the same church, too, but that didn't matter. Betty's father objected to Rob and Rob's father objected to Betty because Betty's father objected to Rob. But Rob did not object to Betty, far from it. He wanted to marry her and he wanted to marry her quickly. He had a moustache and an undying affection and thought that a sufficient equipment for a bridegroom. Betty's father told Betty that if she married without his consent and in his presence he would disinherit her and to clinch things he wrote Rob's father to that effect. Robert was shown the letter and told that the statement went double for him. It looked pretty bad for the course of true love for a while, but not for nothing was Betty the daughter of her father. She found that the two old men had a conference with the pastor and she sent post haste for Rob to come over and bring a suit of his clothes with him. Rob wonderingly complied and was surprised to see Betty snip off her fine growth of hair and trim what was left boy fashion. Then she fixed the hair that it would look like a wig and called for Rob's moustache. In a suit of Rob's she made a personable boy and he was a fairly good looking girl. They sought the minister's house and asked him to marry them. There had to be witnesses so the minister calls in his deacons who regarded the ceremony with approval until it was found that the young folks had complied with the seemingly impossible for had they not been married right in front of father?

"A SHADOW OF THE PAST."—Jacques de Calones, comparatively poor, is in love with the beautiful Louise Swinton. He learns that he has a wealthy rival. To win her favor he steals a necklace and is arrested. The woman for whom he has sinned turns from him in disgust. This is the introduction to the real story. Thirty years later we see the return of Jacques. Ragged, his hair cropped close, his face heavily lined, his slinking gait betraying the creature harrassed by fate, he forces his way through the window into the room where his former love, now a faded feeble woman, sits at her writing table. She sees the reflection of the man in a tiny mirror on her desk, and believes him to be an ordinary housebreaker. Jacques slowly approaches, and asks if she does not remember him. A slow recognition dawns in her eyes, and she is horrified. He bids her listen and see the wreck she has made of his life. Then in a sudden flow of vivid ruthless words, that sear her very soul, he paints the story of his ruined life. As he tells the story, he lives again through the horror of past years, and pacing the room in mental anguish, he cries curses upon his former temptress as, shuddering at the pictures he calls up before her, she sits huddled up in her chair moaning pitifully for mercy. But the end of the story is not yet, and Jacques relentlessly describes to her the degradation, the intolerable suffering of his life as a convict in the stone quarries, his aching limbs, the warden's armed pistol always ready to exact obedience, and the frenzied hopelessness of those long years. The recital comes to an end at last in a torrent of tumbling words, which die away as Louise, struggling under the weight of her emotion and remorse, starts from her chair with a quick choking cry, and as suddenly falls inert at the feet of the ex-convict. Slowly Jacques realizes the tragedy, and taking off his cap walks on his weary way.

"LOVE LAUGHS AT LOCKSMITHS."—Charlie Smithers is anxious to get married to Sadie Fox, but her stern father, a well to do farmer, does not approve of her marrying a gay city fellow with more money than brains. An attempt to elope in an automobile is seen by the irate father, who follows in his rig and quickly overtakes the pair when the auto breaks down. He takes his daughter back with him after administering to Charlie a spanking such as probably reminded him of his more youthful days. Old man Fox after giving Sadie to understand that she is not to stir from her room, starts off to the village to do some marketing. Charlie, who has been watching his opportunity, sees him drive off, and not daring to go through the house, where the other members of the family might see him, obtains the assistance of the colored girl, who brings him a long ladder. With this he climbs up through the window to Sadie. They forget how time flies, and Charlie is still there when Fox returns. With the aid of Sadie and the maid he blacks his face and disguises himself as the colored maid. Then with Sadie he drives to the minister, swiftly pursued by the farmer and his help, who soon discover the trick. Charlie, however, drags the minister down his lawn to a boat on the lake, and in mid-water the two lovers are married, while the irate father stands on the bank, fuming with anger. Thus are the words of the old proverb, "Love laughs at locksmiths," fulfilled.

"RUSSIAN WOLF HUNT."—A long, white avenue relieved by the deep shadow of fir trees upon which the snow crystals hang in a thousand myriad drops is our first impression as the huntsmen, followed by sleighs, set out with the dogs. Shortly afterwards a vast expanse of unbroken snow meets our eyes, then the party enters the forest and the hunt commences.

The hunting party is divided into two contingents, one of which pursues the wolves on horseback with a set of dogs, whilst the individual members of the second party remain on the outskirts of the wood with the attacking dogs held in leash. These dogs, of the greyhound type, are of a mixed English and Russian breed, and as the wolves are driven out of the wood, they dash forward to attack them. Fearless of cruel fangs, they will spring at a wolf and bear him to the ground almost before their masters have time to reach the spot with their lassoes in their hands. Another second, however, and the beast will be captured; a wedge is then forced between its teeth, and in the evening, together with several other captives, it will be brought back still living, amidst the joyous barking of the dogs, and the rattling of sleigh bells, and the shouts of the hunters.

beloved by all the women. His father's second wife, Phaedra, is also charmed by his magnificent looks, and one day confesses to Hippolytus her love for him. He, terrified, spurns her, and in his rage treats her roughly. Theseus, who has been at the wars for some years, returns a conqueror, and is met by his son and together they proceed in triumph to their home. Here Phaedra, thinking to be avenged on Hippolytus for his treatment of her, informs Theseus that in his absence Hippolytus had made love to her. Theseus, enraged, curses his son and banishes him from Athens. Hippolytus accordingly starts off in his chariot drawn by three fiery horses. His course is directed along the seashore, but Poseidon, the god of the Mediterranean, in accordance with the curse of Theseus devoting his son to destruction, causes a wave to dash up and frighten his horses, who bolt, with the result that the chariot is overturned and Hippolytus is killed. The crowd, who quickly assemble, place his corpse on a plank and carry it to his father. Phaedra, stricken with remorse on seeing his dead body, declares his innocence, and, confessing to Theseus that her accusation was unjust, kills herself at the foot of the bier.

"MILITARY CYCLISTS IN BELGIUM."—Here we have the spectacle of two sets of cyclists drilling in the barrack grounds. The picture is taken from a height that enables the picture to show a very comprehensive view. The two sets of men drill in cross shaped figures. These are composed of long single ranks of men riding shoulder to shoulder, each man with one arm flung around his neighbor. From time to time, at the word of command, detachments of men will break with extreme precision from the eight whirling arms, and small bodies of men will follow each other in this way, one after the other, until the order to reform up again is given.

"THE OTHER WAY."—Two old cronies are playing chess in the magnificent suburban home of one of them, when he receives a letter from his only son, Billy, announcing that he will be home again from college at nine thirty. The other then shows a letter he received earlier in the day from his only child, Lucy, stating that she will be back from Vassar college at ten o'clock. They pull out of their pockets the photos of their only children and simultaneously the thought strikes them both—Lucy and Billy must marry one another. They shake hands over it and say good-bye. Billy returns, and as his father greets him, the lad pulls out his handkerchief, and in so doing drops the photos of various actresses. His father tells him he has selected a wife for him. Billy refuses to be dictated to and leaves the house in a huff. Lucy's father on her return home, also finds that she has ideas on marriage, and, when told that her father has selected a husband for her, she leaves her home and declares she will earn her own living. Answering an ad. in the local paper, she obtains a situation as governess to a child of three years, the daughter of a justice of the peace. Billy also locates accidentally as chauffeur with the same family, and, driving Lucy and the child to the park, they fall in love. One day being caught embracing by the master they declare they wish to get married and he performs the ceremony for them. They then each telephone their respective fathers, who come in hot haste when they hear how they have been thwarted. Imagine their surprise when on arrival each old man finds his child married to the partner he had selected for him. This is a brief description of the facts of the story, but you have to see the picture to appreciate the admirable manner in which it is worked out.

"LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT."—The scene opens in a college fraternity house, where three or four young men students are gathered. Tom, our hero, is idling over a book, hopelessly bored, and praying for something to happen. Suddenly seizing the paper he notices a matrimonial ad. which offers inspiration for a practical joke. Jack seizes pen and paper and writes the following: "Young athletic man of good family desires to meet a woman. She must be dark and pretty. Object matrimony." Tom shows the advertisement to his chums, who all good-naturedly enter into the fun, and all leave to place the advertisement with the newspaper.

The following day Jane Williams, living in a neighboring town, reads the advertisement and decides to answer it. Laughingly she writes the note, takes up her photograph, then hesitates as she sees the photograph of her friend, Elinore Ainsley. With a mischievous smile, she decides to send Elinore's photograph instead of her own.

Innocence Protected from the Wiles of a Designer

This is another Biograph pastoral with deep heart interest, and shows the presence of an invisible power which is ever at work to protect the innocent from the numerous attacks of the unconscionable. The little heroine of this story is fascinated by the young city chap who the summer previous was a summer boarder at the homestead. He pays them a visit and invites Sue to take a ride in his car. The car becomes disabled and she is made to believe it impossible to return home that night. The realization of her position appalls her, and sending the young man away she passes the night in the parlor of the roadhouse at which they stopped. Next morning he persuades her to go to the city where he will marry her. This she finds a canard, and ashamed to go home, she seeks employment. Her efforts are successful, but her employer proves himself to be a profligate the moment she is engaged. Now convinced of the falseness of the world she goes back home to be received with open arms by her dear old daddy, who sees in her face the smile of unsullied purity.

GEORGE KLEINE, Selling Agent for Chicago, (52 State Street. Chicago, Ill.)

The next day Tom receives, among a dozen or more answers to his advertisement Jane's letter and Elinore's photograph. Closely studying the pretty face, he finds his practical joke has taken a serious trend, for he is already captivated by the pretty counterfeit.

After two months' correspondence Jane receives Tom's photograph. Now she is conscience stricken, as Tom has promised to spend his vacation in her town, and how will she explain her trick. Tom, she is convinced, is in love with Elinore's picture and not with her.

Shortly after Tom leaves the train at Oakdale and on his way to Jane's house sees Elinore and mistakes her for Jane. When he strides toward her with outstretched hand and a smiling face, Elinore is indignant, while Tom is mystified. Jane, coming on the scene makes matters worse when as Elinore is hurrying into the house, tries to explain that she is Jane. Elinore now sees through the trick, and, returning, takes Tom's arm and leads him off, while poor Jane is left alone in despair.

Matters, however, are finally settled when Tom is invited to Elinore's party, where he again meets Jane and learns that after all Jane's correspondence and not Elinore's photograph was the real attraction.

He proposes an immediate marriage and Jane happily complies. It is late at night when they visit the parson but he marries them and gives them his blessing.

The next day Jane and Tom return to the college town and the boys are introduced to the bride.

"THE LITTLE PROSPECTOR."—Silas Kendall, a prospector, and his daughter Nell, so the story goes, are prospecting in the mountains, a few miles above Canyon City, a little Western town, and the basis of supplies for the hundreds of more or less successful gold prospectors. Kendall has built him a cabin and he and his daughter, a robust little woman, have managed to eke out a living, always hopeful some day of making the "big strike." Kendall is old and not thoroughly responsible at times. In fact, his simplicity and childish trust in all strangers has earned him the uncomplimentary title of half-wit. Twice before our story opens he has lost two valuable claims because of his too freely proclaiming his finds with the consequence that his claims have been staked by other prospectors.

The story opens showing Kendall and his daughter leaving the cabin for the hills. The girl works with him until close to the noon hour when she lays aside her pick and shovel to return to the cabin and prepare dinner. While she is thus engaged, there is a knock at the door and a young miner, Hal Martin, steps in. Martin has accidentally wounded himself in the arm while cleaning his gun and applies to the girl for help. She assists him to bind the wound and thanking her he leaves, after bashfully asking to be permitted to call again.

Kendall, at work in the hills, is about to give up in despair, when he turns up two small nuggets and other fine pay dirt. With a glad cry he springs to his feet and hurries back to the cabin. Showing the specimens to Nell, he tells her he is going down to Canyon City and have them assayed. Nell, however, pleads with him not to do so, having in mind the other two valuable claims which he had unwittingly lost. He finally gives in and during the old man's absence from the room Nell hides the specimens in a coffee pot.

Kendall returns and while Nell is busy outside finds the specimens and skips out of the room.

At the town store the old miner shows the specimens to a number of miners and despite the entreaties of the old store-keeper they entice Kendall to tell them the location of the mine.

Nell returns to the cabin shortly after her father has left, finds the coffee pot on the floor and the specimens gone. She is about to give up in despair when there is a knock at the door and Hal Martin enters. The frantic girl explains her troubles and pleads with Martin to help her save the claim.

At the store the old man has boastfully told of the rich vein and minutely described it to the other miners, who, when satisfied they will have no trouble in finding the location, run out of the store, mount and ride away.

Back at the cabin Martin has listened to the story and tells the girl they must race back to the claim and beat the others to it. The girl quickly saddles a horse, Martin mounts his own and the race to stake the claim begins.

The scenes alternate between the miners and the girl and Martin. However, Martin and the girl arrive just in time, and while Martin holds the others off with his gun, the girl stakes the claim. The others, realizing they are beaten, turn away, leaving Nell and Hal alone.

"JIM BRIDGER'S BRIDE."—The Kalem Indian release for Friday Nov. 18th, deals with an event in the life of Jim Bridgers the famous Indian scout, who was the forerunner of Kit Carson and he is said to have taught Kit Carson all he knew of Indian fighting. The story was gleaned from "Twenty Years Among our Hostile Indians," written by Capt. J. Lee Humfreville of the United States Army and generally regarded as the authority among the works dealing with the history, life and habits of the American Indians. The story embodies a very pretty romance which follows the rescue of an Indian girl by Jim Bridger who falls by accident in one of his bear traps. Jim was taking the girl back to her father's tepee and her brother suspecting foul play set upon Jim who was obliged to kill the Indian in self-defense. The girl's father thereupon sent out after Jim's scalp and would have got it but for the fortunate arrival of a detachment of U. S. Cavalry. The story comes to a pretty ending with a wedding in which an army Chaplain officiates and the parts of the bridesmaid and best man are taken by a couple of stalwart cavalry troopers.

There is a great deal of exciting action running through the story and yet it is of considerable historic value as representing conditions which prevailed in the West at this most picturesque period in American history.

"THE WAY OF LIFE."—Kalem's announcement for the issue of Nov. 16th is a strong dramatic production entitled "The Way of Life." This is the most pretentious studio production the Kalem players have yet brought out and the story is one of intense interest.

John Mason and George Bent were chums in a music conservatory. After they graduated they met and fell in love with the same girl. Mason, however, proved successful and won her for his wife. As time went on Mason's wife proved a shrew and the two gradually became estranged. In the meantime Mason found himself falling in love with one of his pupils. Recognizing his danger he sent the scholar to another teacher, his old friend George Bent. Later on returning to his home one night he found his wife had decamped with another man.

In the course of events Mason secured a divorce and went in search of his former pupil for whom he had a strong attachment which apparently would not down. Finally locating her he found that she was happily married to his old friend George Bent.

The many dramatic situations contained in this absorbing story are cleverly portrayed by the Kalem Players.

GAUMONT.
(George Kleine.)

"BOTH WERE STUNG," OR THE THIRD MAN WON.—A pretty young girl pays a visit to her aunt, the latter having two sons who work their mother's farm. When they see their cousin the result is magical; they both fall head-over-heels in love. The next morning their toilet is most carefully made, each producing some article which scores over the other. While stacking hay during the afternoon, one of them is suddenly taken ill, and betakes himself to the house. The plot not being very deep is understood by his brother, who, five minutes later also appears, having apparently run the haying fork through his leg. Their intentions, however, are rudely frustrated, for the two ladies make the invalids comfortable, and go off to finish the haying. The last scene shows how the waiting game pays, for the girl is seen in a quiet spot embracing a third man, the two brothers being hidden onlookers.

"PICTURESQUE MAJORCA."—In the Mediterranean.—A perfectly photographed panorama of all the worth-while places on this, the largest of the Balearic Islands, which lie south and east of Spain. A combination of scenic and educational views produced in the usual perfect manner of this concern. This film presents all the native activities in a perfectly clear manner and shown under such ideal conditions as to make exceptionally pleasing pictures of events which partake of an industrial tone. Tours of this kind seem to be making decided gains in popular favor. These fascinating scenes form a travel film of pictorial variety and beauty made in a locality out of the usual path of the cinematographer.

"LISBON BEFORE AND DURING THE REVOLUTION."—A very interesting series of pictures showing scenes in Lisbon, the principal streets and views of the more important buildings and harbor; also, Portuguese soldiers with King Manuel very much in evidence. Then there are striking views portraying King Manuel's visit to England last year, with his welcome at Portsmouth, and the later visit to the city, and as an additional interesting item the view taken at King Edward's Funeral, showing King Manuel and the other eight Kings. These in themselves should prove a big attraction.

The views were taken Friday, October 7th, by the Kosmik special Paris representative, and they give a typical representation of the change that has taken place at Lisbon. We see the huge crowds in the public squares, the barricades and the soldiers, the horses and the wounded, and also the very nondescript crowds rushing hither and thither anxious for the latest information. The Republican Flag is to be seen in many directions, and among the buildings that have suffered from the shells we have excellent pictures of the Royal Palace, with great holes in the windows, lamp-posts damaged with bomb shells, ruined houses, and newspaper offices. The whole film is brimming with interest and we anticipate that there will hardly be an audience in the country that will not see this topical and remarkable representation.

"SPANISH LOYALTY."—Showing in detail the Ceremony of Allegiance to the Flag of the Madrid Garrison. King Alphonso XVIII. and his staff at the Country Mass. Oath of Allegiance to the Flag by the Half Country. The Kissing of the Flag. The troops marching past the royal box. Queen Victoria and the Royal Family in the Box.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

"THE RIVAL BARONS."—A splendid drama of the Middle Ages, correct in every detail of staging and costume. The Duke of Hastings and John of Northbourne are rivals for the hand of Alice, the daughter of a neighboring baron. The Duke, rejected, waylays the lovers and imprisons them. On a threat that her lover will be killed, Alice consents to marry the Duke. John makes his escape, and flies for sanctuary to a monastery where the Prior, invested with all the authority of his order, withstands the fugitive's pursuers. A message comes to the Prior from the Duke, asking that a monk may attend at the castle and perform the marriage ceremony. John, disguised as a monk, goes to the castle, first enlisting the aid of Alice's father, who follows him with a bodyguard. Instead of performing the ceremony, the monk throws off his disguise. The Duke, beset from within and without, is overpowered, and the lovers are triumphant.

"AN ALPINE RETREAT" "GERSAU, AND THE LAKE OF URI, SWITZERLAND."—Perhaps no country in the world so lends itself and its beauties to the camera as does this favorite resort of pleasure seekers from every land. The present series affords exquisite panoramic views of Nature at her best, in combination with the results of human ingenuity which has taken advantage of every spot favorable to the purpose of full enjoyment of the picturesque and majestic surroundings.

Wooded heights rise from the water's edge; noble mansions nestle amid horticultural beauties on the banks and islands of the lake; mountains, now half enshrouded in soft morning mists, now bathed in brilliant mid-day sunlight, rise height above height in silent sublimity to the far distant horizon, and the whole forms a motion picture series of exceptional loveliness which will appeal to the stay-at-home and to the traveler alike.

General Film Co. a Boon to Exhibitors.

Messrs. Saxe and Brown, who have a circuit of five fine theatres in Milwaukee and vicinity—the Saxe theatres, the Princess and Modjeska, being the leading picture theatres in America—were in the city last week arranging with the General Film Co., at 85 Dearborn street, for service.

The Western Film Exchange of Milwaukee, formerly attended to their bookings, and now that it has joined the "independents" these gentlemen are anxious to contract for the best licensed service possible.

Much dissatisfaction has existed for some time with the service of the Western, as several makes of film which these managers and owners of theatres called for, and which their patrons desired, were not included among the Western's purchases. More especially was this true of the product of Gaumont and Urban-Eclipse.

Nor are complaints against the Western's former methods confined to the gentlemen mentioned. Harry Goldner, manager of the Post and Comet theatres of Green Bay, Wis., was also a visitor at the offices, at 85 Dearborn street, last week. Manager Goldner asserts that he has demanded from the Western, quite a number of times, the Gaumont and Urban-Eclipse makes, because his patrons clamored for them, but that no effort was made to supply him. He has also arranged for his bookings with the General Film Co., at 85 Dearborn street.

It has been known for some time past that the Western, while flying the licensed flag, was not only in sympathy with, but also allied with certain "independent" interests. Now it has a chance to show how it will stand on its own feet.

Chicago Film Brevities.

I am just in receipt of the new style leaflet bulletin of the Kleine Optical Co. It is printed on one side only, in two colors, the titles being in bold red type and the descriptions in black. The sheet is 8 by 11 inches, the paper of fine quality, and the illustrations clear and handsome. Accompanying and supplementing the pictorial bulletin of "The Revolution in Portugal" is a descriptive bulletin, also in two colors, which will make an excellent advertisement for display in the lobby.

The Selig publicity department has gotten out a comprehensive line of small printing for the "Boy City" film. These miniature folders and leaflets will be fine advance courants of the presentation of that subject, and should be widely distributed among patrons by exhibitors. "Boy City" will be released, I understand, some time near the close of November.

The "efficiency dinner" given in the gold room of the Congress hotel Saturday evening, Nov. 5, under the auspices of certain business men of Chicago, was attended by John D. Rock, R. R. Nehls, B. W. Beadell and W. A. Daniels, all well known in film circles. Dr. F. W. Gunsaulaus and other noted speakers delivered addresses on appropriate subjects.

I had the pleasure of meeting Judge Willis Brown last week and had an interesting conversation with him. Judge Brown, the famous founder of boy cities in this country, informed me that within the past 16 months he has addressed 80,000 boys and girls, and that in schools, theatres and churches, within the same time, he has been instrumental in getting 1,000,000 boys and girls to sign the American Anti-Cigarette pledge. No one should miss "Boy City," the Selig film showing the operations of Judge Brown's Boy City near Charlevoix, Mich., and which will be released soon.

John B. Rock celebrated his twenty-seventh birthday at his home, with a number of friends, Saturday, Nov. 5.

M. G. Kreusch, representing the Edison laboratory products, visited Manager John Hardin of the Edison Company last week. Mr. Kreusch departed for Indianapolis and other cities in Indiana.

William X. MacCollin, manager of the Fairyland theatre on Milwaukee avenue, was a caller at The Film Index office last week. He told me that a new theatre, the Lyric, at 1217 Milwaukee avenue, costing about $10,000, and built by the Lyric Theatre Company, will be opened Saturday, Nov. 12. The Lyric will seat 300 people. It is beautifully decorated in the interior, and has a most attractive front, both of these important adjuncts being attended to by the Decorators Supply Company of this city. The General Film Co., at 435 North Clark street, will furnish service to both the Lyric and Fairyland, Mr. MacCollin being manager for both houses.

N. DUSHANE CLOWARD DEAD.

Mr. N. Dushane Cloward, forty-six years old, a noted vocalist and amusement director, died suddenly from uraemic poisoning, at his home, in Wilmington, Del., last night. He is said to be the first man to introduce motion pictures in this country, bringing the Passion Play from Europe. At the second Cleveland inauguration in Washington he directed a chorus of 3,000 voices to the accompaniment of the Marine Band. A widow and family survive.

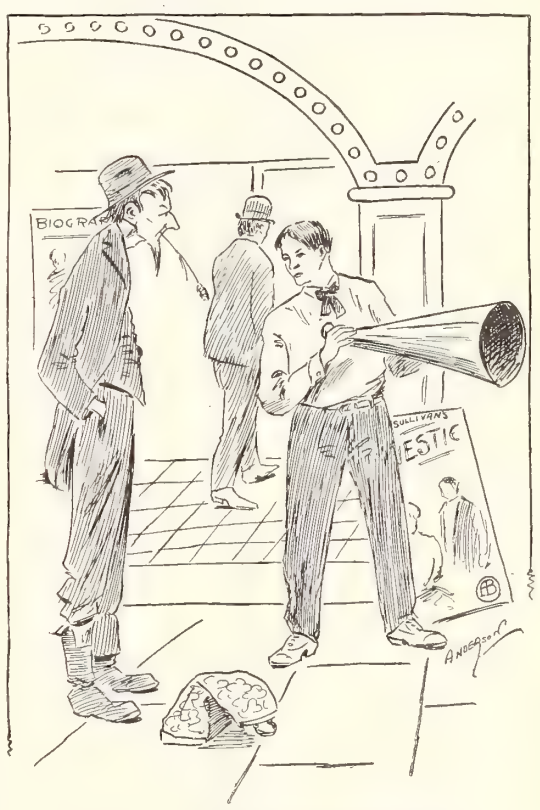
H. O. Wetherell and Willis V. Snow are to open a photoplay theatre in Flamouth, Mass. The house will be ready some time the latter part of November.

The Unique photoplay theatre on Main street, Milwaukee, Wis., has been sold to George B. Freelson. The house was formerly run under the management of C. E. Brown, who has gone to California.

INDIAN ORCHARD'S NEW HOUSE.

Indian Orchard, Mass., is to have a new photoplay theatre, which will be erected on Oak street, near the corner of Main, on the property belonging to Michael H. Lyons.

The new theatre will be a model; it will have a frontage of 40 feet on Oak street and will run back 68 feet or more. The plans call for one floor and gallery. The seating capacity will be about 500.



A WHEEZE FROM HOOSIERDOM.

An exhibitor from a good little town in Indiana contributes this as an evidence of the universality of the motion picture:

Uncle Si—"Hey, boy, whatcher makin' such a fuss about?"

Boy—"Go in an' see the big show, Uncle."

Uncle Si—"Whatcher got in there?"

Boy—"Movin' pictures."

Uncle Si—"O shucks; got 'em down in our town, tew."

"A DIXIE MOTHER"

A Vitagraph Feature Film and "Life Portrayal"

"THE picture of the year!" This is the general expression of opinion and it seems to us a very just one. "The Dixie Mother" embodies a variety of emotions which require the most careful and skilful handling on the part of the author and the actors to express. These emotions are the mother love, the wife love and the love of home and country; the latter confined to that part of the Union, the South in the Confederation and Rebellion against the North. The love of country is environment, infused and governed by the love and strengthened by the birthplace of those most near and dear to her.

The Dixie Mother's youngest son was being educated at West Point in the North before the war and at the outbreak of the Civil War returns to his home in the South. His father and brother were enlisted in the Confederate army when the young fellow comes home. He is loathe to fight against the Union which he has sworn to defend and maintain. His mother urges him to fight for the Confederacy and join his father and brother in defense of the South.

He has hardly left the old mansion with his brother when he is shot dead by a detachment of Union scouts and his brother is wounded. Rushing from the house the mother looks upon her dead son, accuses the Union officer of the deed; he shows her he has only a sword and it must have been done by a bullet fired by one of his men. The officer is very courteous and expresses sorrow for her bereavement.

The boy's body is carried into the house. The young officer and the soldiers depart taking prisoner the wounded son who is sent to a hospital tent of the Union encampment. After the soldiers have gone the father comes from the secret chamber where he hid upon the approach of the enemy, beholds the body of his boy and swears eternal enmity against the North.

While the wounded son is in the hospital he is attended by a young nurse, a Northern girl, with whom he falls in love and at the same time he and the young officer become fast friends.

After the war the son goes North, marries the young nurse and one year later returns South and sends a letter, knowing his father's hatred, telling his father that he and his Northern wife and their baby are at the cross roads. He would like his father to meet them and let the past be forgotten and forgiven in a happy reunion at the old homestead.

The mother gets the letter during her husband's absence. She shows it to him when he gets back. He refuses to listen to her appeal to forget his vow and welcome their boy and his family to their home and hearts. While this is going on the old colored servant, following his mistress' orders, brings down the cradle in which she had rocked her own children and is now to be at the service of her grandchild.

Heartbroken and worn out by the conflict of country and the greater conflict of her soul, the poor mother enters the home and when she sees the cradle her mind gives way at the recollection of her dead boy who once occupied the little bed. Her husband comes into the room and realizes his wife's condition, relents, tenderly kisses her and goes to the crossroads, meets his son and family who are accompanied by the young officer, whom we saw at the time of the younger son's death, coming back to see the daughter whom he loved at first sight.

They are welcomed by the father and reach the old home just as the mother in her derangement is about to pierce her heart with a sword which is gently taken from her by the Northern officer. Her son places his child in her arms and gradually as she fondles the little one her reason returns with the natural instincts of mother love. She holds the child up to her husband and he kisses its tiny hand which holds the stars and stripes in its grasp while he fondly clasps his wife in loving embrace indicative of reunion and peace.

There is a depth of sentiment and subtlety of thought to this picture which it is safe to say has seldom, if ever, been arrived at by any other company and it is a noticeable and well deserved compliment when we say it could not have been more perfectly cast and successfully portrayed.

SCENE FROM VITAGRAPH LIFE PORTRAYAL, "A DIXIE MOTHER."

PLAYING THE PICTURES

By Clyde Martin

HAVE you ever stopped to consider what the manufacturers are doing toward the advancement of the motion picture business, and what has been accomplished during the last ten or twelve months? All of the manufacturers are working hard and spending thousands of dollars to make the picture business an industry that will be looked up to, instead of being condemned. It is certainly encouraging when they engage such people as Elbert Hubbard, Rex Beach, Roy Norton, and Caroline Wells to write their plays, and then to have such people as Pilar-Morin and Florence Turner, the greatest exponents of the silent drama the world has ever known, playing in your theatre two or three nights a week, it seems that the exhibitor should at least furnish the proper music.

I know an exhibitor in the middle west that has just ordered a six thousand dollar pipe organ for his picture house and there are hundreds of other exhibitors who have been just as foolish. With all due respects for the manufacturers of pipe organs, I think it is the worst investment a man can make. If the ten dollar piano player does not make good, and the exhibitor has more money than brains, his last resort is a pipe organ. Then comes the old story, he has invested so much money in the instrument that he must cut expenses in some way so the lot falls to the musician and he secures a ten dollar organist. Great combination, is it not? If Mr. Exhibitor had only considered paying a little more money for a good piano player, one that would have made good with the audience, he would never have thought of getting a pipe organ.

Let us say, you have one of the best pipe organs on the market, and you want your musician to "play the pictures," do you realize, out of the entire output of association pictures in a week, there will not be over three reels that organ music will be appropriate? Again I say, the piano is the only instrument that can ever be used in playing pictures.

The pipe organ gives a very effective accompaniment where a picture is shown with religious sentiment, but a piano, when handled properly is just as good, and figure the money saved. Can you imagine a pipe organ accompaniment through such pictures as "The Telephone," Vitagraph, "The Education of Elizabeth," Kalem, or "Examination Day at School," Biograph, it would certainly be a joke. Of course there are two sides to all questions, on the other hand, take such a picture as Gaumont's "A Penitent of Florence" or Pathe's "Sister Angelica," the organ would be great for a picture of this nature, but it is so seldom that we get such pictures, it would hardly justify anyone in paying several thousand dollars for such an instrument, still exhibitors will pay this great amount for an organ that can only be used once in a while, and will not pay a good salary to a piano player that can accompany any picture that is thrown on the screen.

WITH OR WITHOUT ARMS

pany has offered suggestions for appropriate music to accompany several of their releases. I am certainly glad to see a company like the Vitagraph people taking an interest in the musical end of the picture business, but I must admit that their suggestions are very poor. For example in their bulletin number 222, where they give a description of the release of October 29th. "The Telephone," in their note they say, "During the scene of the telephone exchange the musicians can play selection from "The Telephone Girl." Just think of it, have you seen the picture? During the telephone exchange scene the telephone girl is connecting the frantic wife with her husband at the club, and the men at the club are calling the fire department, from the expression on the telephone girl's face you can imagine she hears the cracking of the flames on the other end of the wire, that have cut off all means of escape for that frantic mother and child. And in such a scene the Vitagraph company would like to hear the catchy selections from "The Telephone Girl."

This is a mistake that is made by half of the musicians in the country, they will pick up a publisher's catalogue and get names of songs that correspond with the scenes portrayed and they never consider that to make their point, the audience must know what they are playing. There are a few pieces such as "It Looks Like a Big Night To-night," "Waiting at the Church," "We Won't Go Home Until Morning," "Don't Take Me Home," "Everybody Works But Father," that can be used in comedy scenes to good advantage, such pieces as these are known by everyone and when you play them in an appropriate scene the audience appreciates your efforts.

I believe in the use of comic opera music, but not in such pictures as "The Telephone." Whenever you get pictures such as "The Tactics of Cupid," Gaumont, "Alice in Wonderland," Edison, or "The Land of Oz," Selig, there is nothing more appropriate than selections from such light operas as "King Dodo," "The Burgomaster," "The Sultan of Sulu," or "Babes in Toyland." I might say when you get a "Special" picture, such as "Chew Chew Land," the Vitagraph release of Sept. 6th, the most appropriate music you could play would be "Oh You Spearment Kiddo, With the Wriggley Eyes."

I have been advised by one of the largest association manufacturers that they are about to release a certain grand opera film in the near future, and, as an experiment they are compiling a musical score to accompany the picture. This music will run scene for scene with the picture and the commencement of each title will be marked with a cue on the music. It is certainly encouraging when a manufacturer will take this much interest in the music for pictures, and it seems that the exhibitor should at least do his share, by securing a competent musician to handle the music.

I believe the next improvement in the film business will be the marking of titles with a musical cue. It may be in the next three or four months, or it may be years, but it is sure to come.

To begin with, in playing appropriate music for the pictures, you must divide the pictures in classes, and for the first class let us take the scenic pictures. There is hardly a change of program in your theatre that you do not have a scenic picture on the bill. For the average scenic picture a waltz or a march is about the only music you can find appropriate for the surroundings, but there are a few exceptions. Take for example Pathe's short scenic picture, the release of October 19th, "Around Pekin," or the Urban-Eclipse release of July 20, "Pekin, the Walled City," try and arrange some weird or oriental music, play it in a regular Chinese sing song way and have your drummer keep time with his turkish cymbal and tom tom, striking both the cymbal and the tom tom at the same time. It may be possible that later on, I can prepare a small chart for this page showing my style of oriental music.

When you get such a picture as the Pathe release of September 9th, "The Belgian Army," or the Vitagraph release of October 29th, "A Day on the French Battleship Justice," never attempt to use anything but a march. The same may be said about the first and last part of the Vitagraph picture released October 11th. "Actors' Fund Field Day," save your marches for all military events, processions, and any picture where a band is shown.

For industrial pictures, such as the Selig release of August 1st, "Shrimps," the Urban-Eclipse release of August 24th "Shipbuilding of Toulon, France," or the Pathe release of September 5th, "Zoological Gardens in Antwerp" a good waltz is the best, and in fact the only music that can be used. On the other hand if you have some industrial or scenic pictures taken in Spain or Mexico, you can play some Spanish air that will give life, and be in keeping with the picture and it gives the drummer a chance to use Castanets or tambourines.

In my next article I will give a few points in playing for Indian pictures. Indian pictures are possibly the easiest of all to play but the use of the tom tom is sadly abused in most places. There is a great deal in the drummer knowing when to use the tom tom and when not to, and I will try and make this point clear, next week.

MONTREAL NEWS.

During the past week a very important event in the photoplay business has occurred. The event was concerned with a movement to form what shall be known as "The United Photoplay Theatre Association of Montreal," and there is every indication that the movement thus set on foot will be a successful issue.

Mr. Montessano presided over the meeting and explained how necessary a matter it was for them to protect their interests in the face of ever changing civic and provincial by-laws which tended to deter their legitimate business. All the managers and proprietors present took a lively interest in the discussion which ensued, and Mr. Gauvreau took occasion to explain in detail the benefits that may accrue from such a bonding of all their efforts for the cause of mutual protection. Mr. Canover of the Nickel urged the meeting to contribute liberally to fight against the Sunday closing by-law which is to be decided by the Supreme Court, and a handsome collection was made of about $800, Messrs. Nicholas, Demers and Montesano and the Gaiety Theatre each giving $100.

The election of officers resulted as follows: Pres., Mr. Conover; Vice-Pres., L. E. Quimet; Sec., Mr. Sharpe; Committee—Messrs. Nicholas, Spardakos, Montessano, Gauvreau and Beck.

A vote of thanks was rendered to the management of the "Pousiana Photoplay Theatre," St. Catherine East, for their kindness in permitting the use of their auditorium for the meeting.

Among those present were: Messrs. F. Gauvreau, G. Nicholas, Moulin Roughe Theatre; P. G. Demitre, Starland Theatre; H. W. Canover, Nickel Theatre; Rufiange & Gamelin, Majestic Theatre; A. Kouri, Circle Theatre; E. N. Lawande, King Edward Theatre; J. Baraket, Wonderland Theatre; J. Sperdakos, Fairyland Theatre; A. N. Sharpe, Casino Theatre; A. Demers and B. Montassano, Nationoscope Theatre; Z. Renand, Gaiety Theatre, and R. C. Beek, Nickeland Theatre.

ROUND ABOUT NEW YORK

With regret we report the death of Mr. B. Weissman at Mt. Sinai Hospital on Saturday, November 5th. He was taken to the hospital and an abdominal operation performed Friday; the funeral was held Sunday afternoon from his home at 485 Eighth avenue. Mr. Weissman had long been associated with Mr. McCarn in operating one of their amusement enterprises, The Scenic Theatre, at 605 Eighth avenue, and much of the success of this house was due to his ability.

Vaudeville exhibitions in conjunction with the five-cent picture houses are, at best, usually exhibitions of bad taste, and adherence to this combination with the five-cent admission, an exhibition of bad judgment. Good pictures and very mediocre vaudeville "acts" make poor entertainment; good pictures and good vaudeville can not be given or expected in the five-cent houses. Acceptable performances are sometimes seen; but when the acts are good, they soon go where they will readily bring more money than can be afforded from the receipts of the five-cent theatre—unless one "spends twenty-three cents to earn a quarter."

Mr. R. L. McNabb, of the New Family Theatre, 551 Eighth avenue, by some good fortune, is able to offer his patrons better vaudeville than they could reasonably expect. Although tolerable vaudeville for the five-cent admission is so unusual, Mr. McNabb obtains a class of acts to which the five-cent house is but a stepping stone: It is worth comment that the New Family Theatre is so frequently a "stepping-stone."

The Regal Theatre, 2028 Third avenue, managed by Mr. Koehler, is a large, airy place, conforming well to lighting requirements, and shows the latest films by able operators; but—what an improvement could be made in the front of this house; the general appearance of neglect and dilapidation could be oversome by just a little "cleaning up" and the unusually large entrance could be utilized to good advantage.

That one can play to a full house with nothing but "commercial" service, is proven by the attendance in the "Pictureland" at 1957 Third avenue and this in a section of the city congested with picture theatres. Mr. Weisfeld does not offer "vaudeville"—so-called—nor does he offer late releases; but he does offer a clean, light house, well ventilated. Courteous attention and good projection complete his list of "Daily Features."

Although ideal conditions are not to be expected on the East Side of New York, a broom would work wonders in many of the houses; the clean, well ventilated house is a welcome and not very usual sight in this section. The Bayard at 32 Bowery and the Central Opera House at 219 East 67th street, have a general excellence in appearance and service that might be emulated with advantage by some of the other houses—Messrs. Markgraf and Costello are to be congratulated and thanked for affording the wanderer on the East Side an agreeable change.

While there is considerable opportunity for improvement, the association houses present, on the whole, a far better appearance than the Independent houses. In fact, the general neglected and disagreeable appearance of the East Side motion-picture theatres is probably due to these same Independent houses where the service is "cheap" in every sense, and the theatre usually as garish and badly managed as the entertainment is poor. A particularly squalid place, for example, is that of the "People's Palace," at 1196 Second avenue.

The remark "they never come back" can't be applied to those unfortunate but sadly-wise association exhibitors who have turned "Independent." They do come back—to stay! One experience is usually enough; poorer in purse, but richer in knowledge, they agree with the raven: "Never More."

The Central theatre, 1153 First avenue, is one of the places on the East Side that is doing a good business with a well lighted and ventilated house. The front of this house is commendable, a pleasant respite from the "gingerbread" front with the entrance cluttered with "stands" of various kinds and littered with all sorts of so-called advertising devices. The best stand and the only one necessary is a bulletin board placed in some conspicuous position not in the way. The board can be used for the photographs or cuts of the players and the synopsis of the films. Put the "paper" on panels in the walls and do away with the unsightly "banner" over the door—a neat house means business and a neat entrance draws it.

"Let there be light,"—and then some more light. Mr. H. E. Levy, proprietor of the Comet Theatre at 100 Third avenue and its manager, Mr. G. W. Anson have evidently taken this to heart; for their house is light—l-i-g-h-t. The success of their efforts to have more light is due in a great measure to the fact that they are using the new "Solar Screen" whose metallic surface so increases the brilliancy of the picture that there is no longer any excuse for the "dark house." Darkness has, if nothing else, a depressing effect and—may hide dirt.

Negotiations are in progress for the establishing of a photoplay theatre in Wier Village, Mass. The proposed house will be situated on West Water street.

A NIHILISTIC DRAMA

Kalem Players Take a Leaf Out of Russian Life

UNDER the title "Rachael," the Kalem Company gives a glimpse of Russia and Nihilism, as it is properly understood. The scenic effects are well adapted to the subject and the characters are near to the real thing. There is a little love episode running through the story which has a tragic ending, giving a strong dramatic touch to the picture. The story opens with a scene of the cottage of a Russian peasant and shepherdess who lives very humbly with his daughter Rachael. It's the daughter's duty to tend the sheep, and while out on the plains she is approached by the son of the Prince who governs that region. The young prince is rather taken with the shepherdess and the two subsequently fall in love. What might have been the result of the fondness of the young people for each other may only be conjectured, for the Prince, resenting an act of disrespect on the part of the girl's father, orders the old peasant out of the country.

The father and daughter journey to America, where they join a group of Nihilists. At a meeting of this band the death of the Prince, who drove Rachael and her father out of the county, is planned and Rachael is persuaded to carry out the sentence.

The next scene is the Prince's castle where a reception has been given, at which Rachael appears as a rich American girl and makes quite an impression upon the old Prince. When all the guests have left and the lights have been turned out Rachael returns bent upon carrying out her mission of death. She sees the old Prince standing out on the veranda and is about to fire at him when the son enters the room and stops her. There is a recognition and a recollection of the fondness that once existed, when the young man realizes that this woman has attempted his father's life and orders her away. Broken-hearted, Rachael returns to her Nihilist companions. As she approaches the door of the meeting room she realizes death is the fate of those who do not fulfill their mission. She writes the words "I have failed on the door and then takes her own life. The shot startles the inmates of the room and they open the door to discover the lifeless body.

While the ending is tragic, the story is of a phase of life that is not unfamiliar to those who have followed the history of events in Russia. Photography and action of the picture is good.

DO NOT AFFECT MORALS

Pittsfield Eagle Claims All Pictures Have Good Morals—Fault Lies with Parents

Frequently The Eagle receives newspapers containing details of distressing cases wherein children and motion pictures figure.

Only recently there came to hand a clipping headed "Hold-up Picture Caused Stabbing by Boy Brigands."

Many a time and oft we have been importuned to "exert our influence to suppress motion pictures."

Before us lies a letter, the closing paragraph of which reads:

"Why do you not throw your influence on the moral side of the question. Let theatre managers make money, but not at the sacrifice of children."

We cannot agree with all of those who send us news articles and write us letters dealing with this subject. We cannot, for instance, subscribe to the statement that a boy perfectly normal in every way, who has hitherto borne a good reputation; whose way of living is above reproach; who neither smokes cigarettes nor keeps the company of evil companions, we do not believe, we say, that such a boy could witness a motion picture portrayal of an Indian fight and go forth and bury a tomahawk in the cranium of the first man be chanced to encounter on the street. Neither do we believe that a boy, morally degenerate, could witness such a performance and be made any the worse for it.

In motion pictures, as in most of the every day affairs of life, it is the good man who finally triumphs and the bad man who is crushed to earth, never to rise again as such.

In all the great plays of ancient and modern times violence has figured. Just because a man is murdered in it, shall we sacrifice the sublime tragedy of Hamlet? Is all that is best in music, art and the drama to be banished from the earth just because in some of it there is an element of that which is suggestive of the tragic and terrible? If we are to make a beginning in reformation of entertainment and amusement and instruction where are we to draw the line? Must every picture depicting carnage on the glorious battlefields of history, go?

All too many sentimentalists are unwilling to have their children take a chance. They would make of them hot house plants. They would prevent them from coming in contact with anything calculated, as it were, to put to the test their moral fibre.

In our judgment more children are benefited by motion pictures than are harmed by them. We have in mind a boy who saw an Indian fight in a motion picture house. He stayed until the film had been run off and then he told his father he wanted to go home. They hurried there and on the trip the youngster said never a word. When he burst into the room where his mother was, he exclaimed: "There was a great big man down there and he got a lovely woman out of danger—and that is the way I am going to take care of you all through life." That was the lesson one clean-minded, wholesome boy learned from a horrible moving picture!

In our judgment, if parents were to spend as much time with their children—in pointing out to them the pitfalls and the dangers and the thorny paths of life—as they spend in trying to abolish motion picture houses, the world would be infinitely better off. The motion pictures have come to stay and in coming, they have brought with them the events of all the world. They have brought scenes that the great bulk of the people never have a chance to visit. They have brought scenes that cover all the wide range of human activity from fishing on the banks of Newfoundland to "kids" bathing on India's coral strand!

No condemnation is too severe for men who fatten their purses through the reproduction of salacious pictures and miserable pictorial excuses for life and its realities. For the clean, instructive, entertaining, amusing pictures, we have only words of praise. They are in the highest, broadest and best sense, educational. For the sake of the bad, the good ought not to be lost. Establish a censorship if you will, but let it be directed by men who have no axe to grind.

PATHE "STRIKE" PICTURES.

In order that nothing of importance should slip through the daily calendar, the Pathe Freres people have had a busy time during the recent Express Drivers' strike, in New York. Last week, three groups of camera men and actors were out, where the trouble was thickest, and some stirring and lifelike pictures were taken. These were sent to the Bound Brook studio for development.

As soon as the strike commenced, M. Gessnier, the head of the local studio, saw a chance to weave some thrilling incidents around the situation. This he has done, taking some of the scenes right in the heart of the strikers' camp.

OPERATORS' MASQUE BALL.

Cincinnati Operators' Union No. 165 gave a masque ball at Central Turners Hall, Cincinnati, Ohio, on Halloween night, which was a social success. The committee of arrangements in charge of the affair consisted of the following members of the organization: Bernard Roehm, chairman; William Thornton, Harry Heulsman, Harry McOmber, William Newman and Charles Russell.

The members of the Union wore white caps and a very attractive badge as distinguishing marks. The affair commenced at 7 o'clock Monday evening and continued till 4 o'clock the following morning, but every operator was on his job ready for work the next day.

The officers of No. 165 are Edward Kirsch, president; James Curtis, vice-president; Harry Schwartz, secretary- treasurer; Edward Walker, business agent, and Fred Biere, sergeant-at-arms. Trustees: Henry Lacey, Nelson Clarke, Robert Ramsey.

DURABILITY PROVEN.

When a new motion picture machine is placed on the market it is subjected to attacks from all sides, and even if the pictures it projects are superior, its critics will make all the capital possible by claiming the machine is not durable. This feature can only be proven by time, and many a much lauded machine has gone down under the strenuous test of daily grind.

The Motiograph has fully answered its critics on all points, and has demonstrated by its wonderful record of the past three years that its durability can not be successfully questioned, and as a result the makers of this machine find great difficulty in keeping pace with their orders.

The management of the opera house, Pekin, Ill., has purchased a new picture machine. Since its arrival the pictures have greatly improved.

The Lemieux Motion Picture Co. is erecting a photoplay theatre on Canning street, Windsor, Vt.

George Loucks has sold the Crystal theatre, of Hartford City, Ind., to S. A. Radabaugh and Charles Sipe.

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.

Scott & Van Altena.

"I WOULDN'T GIVE MY HEART TO ANY OTHER GIRL BUT YOU."—Lyrics by Edgar Leslie; melody by Pen Edwards; published by Leo Feist.—A very tuneful ballad, being Ben Edwards; brother of Gus Edwards, first attempt as a melody maker. The models are exceptionally fine looking and the back grounds beautiful—some extremely new and novel. The painting is exquisite, which is not saying anything unusual of the paintings of this firm's slides.

"GOLDEN HEARTED DAISIES."—Words by Elizabeth Gorden; music by W. R. Williams; published by William Rossiter, of Chicago. A very pretty waltz song in which the young man sends his love to the "dear girl" by means of a bunch of daisies, supposing that she might read his love while gazing into the bright, little faces of the flowers. Everybody admires the daisies, so this set abounding in "daisy" novelties should be enjoyed by all.

"THAT DREAMY ITALIAN WALTZ."—Words by Joseph McCarthy; music by Al. Piantadosi; published by Leo Feist. This is really a very good song with exceptionally fine slides illustrating it. The characteristic Italian peasants are represented in the views with their rich coloring and generally striking appearance. The couple is seen in different dance and love poses which the Italians know so well. This set on the whole, is very much different than the average.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"COWBOY."—Words by Bobby Heath; music by Chas. O'Donnell; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co. About twice a year this enterprising publisher brings out a cowboy song, and here is a sure fire hit. Both lyrics and melody have the western theme. And the slides—real western scenes, taken in the "Garden of the Gods," away out West, with posing done by a real cowboy and cow-girl amid such grand scenery, reflects the greatest credit on the producer and shows that Wheeler is right up to the minute, as it is seldom such scenery is shown in song slides.

"GEE WHIZ, SWEETY, I'M STUCK ON YOU."—By James Brockman and Bert Fitzgibbon; published by M. Witmark & Sons. A dainty little love ballad, which is not as "mushy" as the title would imply, with a swinging melody which cannot help but become popular. The pretty little model used in the slides is, indeed, a "sweety" and Wheeler has taken full advantage of both lyrics and models to produce a set of slides which are all to be desired by the most critical audience. Some of the novelty slides are unique and reflect credit on the maker.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"MOTHER, DEAREST SWEETHEART."—Words and music by Wm. T. Vayo; published by Wm. Vayo Music Co., Boston, Mass. A beautiful melody and a dainty little story of the love of a boy for his mother. The sweet-faced mother is shown from youth to age in a series of beautiful pictures, such as Simpson knows so well how to make.

"I'M GOING TO TAKE THE TRAIN FOR HOME, SWEET HOME."—Words and music by Herbert H. Ingraham, author of "You Are the Ideal of My Dreams," "Roses Bring Dreams of You;" published by Shapiro. This is the last song written by this composer, and Simpson has shown his knowledge of stage craft, by the clever groupings of actors in their varied poses.

Levi Co., Inc.

"POLLYWOG WIGGLE."—Published by Shapiro; written and composed by those three wonderful song writers, Edgar Selden, Al Byran and Fred Fisher. When a combination like this get together on one song you can bank on a tremendous hit and Pollywog is the goods. It's a novelty song, all about two frogs and illustrated in a manner that will produce a riot wherever shown.

"OH, YOU CHICKEN."—Words by Ray Goetz and music by Fred Fisher; published by Shapiro. This is another great novelty song, where every slide produces a big laugh. The "Birdon Nellie's Hat" is a real live rooster, a big trouble maker and the way he worries little Nellie is simply side-splitting. A remarkable set of slides.

Excelsior Slide Co.

"BECKIE, STAY IN YOUR OWN BACKYARD."—By Norman and Young; published by F. A. Mills, New York. A Jewish song with typical Jewish poses.

"THE LITTLE HOUSE THAT'S BIG ENOUGH FOR TWO."—By Howard Humphrey; published by Jerome H. Remick, New York. Howard Humphrey's compositions are few and far between, but each one has been a decided success. This latest one is no exception. The illustrations by the Excelsior Co., contain eighteen slides.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

The Thanksgiving Proclamation "Drumsticks" is something that everybody can be thankful for. Turkey is so filling and satisfying; so is "Drumsticks"; it fills the bill, fills us with joy and pleasure and satisfies our longings as nothing else will do. If you want to give the people what they want, give it to them when they want it—Thanksgiving week and Thanksgiving day. "Drumsticks," the great turkey picture is at your service Tuesday, November 15th.

A drama, "Suspicion," a comedy, "A Four Footed Pest," and a novelty film, "The Statue Dog," on the same reel; a comedy drama, "Love, Luck and Gasoline," will be the Vitagraph offering for the week of November 21st.

A few words in advance about "Jack Fat and Jim Slim." It's a full laugh and a long one. People go to Coney Island to have a good time. This picture gives everyone a chance of going with these two merry-makers on Friday, December 2d, to the isle of furious fun and frolic and having the time of their lives.

"The Preacher's Wife" is a sermon to those who preach and those who look and learn. From the eye to the mind this picture carries the lesson that we must be human as well as divine; words cannot convey what this beautiful drama teaches.

"The Tale of Two Cities" by Charles Dickens in three reels is now in production by the Vitagraph Company. This will undoubtedly prove the chef d'oeuvre of motion pictures. The story possesses the dramatic qualities, full of the most absorbing and intense situations and the greatest depths of emotional interest, those characteristic of character that reaches the heights of human beatification.

No limitations have been placed on its scenic splendor and accuracy; the most painstaking and accomplished actors only are in the cast and everything possible is being done to make it meet the thoughtful dramatization which this great subject has been given and demands. The unprecedented success of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" has prompted the "Tale of Two Cities," which with its vast dramatic opportunities will make it phenomenally popular.

Here is a question which was propounded to the Vitagraph scenario editor. "Do you know whether the following would pass the Board of Censors: 'The Duke delays the pardon, Marie, suspecting treachery, goes on a hunt for the Duke and discovers him in the park killing time.' "

HALLBERG ECONOMIZER PLEASES DENVER MAN.

Mr. J. H. Hallberg, inventor of the Hallberg economizer, reports that he is just in receipt of a letter from the Star Amusement Co., Denver, Colo., reading: "I purchased one of your 220-volt economizers and it paid for itself in just nine weeks. Now it is working for me at the rate of $50 per month. Our light is fully as good as it was when I was running on direct current and used an old rheostat. Best wishes for your continued prosperity."

STAR THEATRE DRAWS BIG CROWDS.

The new Star theatre, which opened in Newburgh, N. Y., last week, seems to be the big attraction, at that Hudson River city, at present. Since the opening night, the house has been crowded to capacity, and Manager Cohen is doing all possible to give the patrons the best class of pictures.

The house is fireproof; the walls are of concrete, the roof substantial and there are eleven exits, which will allow nearly one thousand persons to leave the building in three minutes.

The operating machine is located in a fireproof booth, large enough for the operators to move conveniently around in. The house is partly light.

HUBBELL, MICH., WILL HAVE PHOTOPLAY THEATRE.

Within the next few weeks Hubbell, Mich., will have a first class photoplay theatre, that will cause some of the neighboring towns to feel jealous. The managers D. Angelo Di Bari and Joseph Serassio are well known picture men from South Range, where they successfully run one of the prettiest houses in the upper part of the state. The theatre will be installed in the Henry Opal building on Main street, and will be 20 by 60 feet. It will contain about 400 seats. In the front of the house there will be a large electric sign, with the name of the house studded with small electric bulbs. Only the best licensed pictures will be used and there will be a complete change of program twice a week.

BIO Carbons Produce the Results on Actual Test

The following list by Frank J. Fuller, Secretary, I. B. E. W. Local No. 1, St. Louis, shows what expert operators find in the BIO Carbon:

Size Picture,	22 in. x 24 in.	Lamp,	Edison Imp.
Distance Projected,	86 ft. 9 in.	Average time per reel,	20 min.
Current,	Alternating	Number of reels per 6 in. BIO Carbon, above and below,	6
Arc Voltage,	55	Number of reels per 6 in. ——— Carbon, above and below,	3
Amperes at Arc,	60

REMARKS: With BIO Carbons, light was improved: Outlines and tracery were clearer and softer, and noise was about 50 per cent. less.

BIO Carbons burned perfectly even while the other chipped, cracked and pencilled and required more frequent manipulation

Tests were run side by side for three weeks on all degrees of association film, from clear to dense.

GETTING AFTER THE PICTURE PIRATES

Motion Picture Patents Company Commences Actions Against the Steiner, Miles and Bauman Combinations for Infringement of Edison Camera Patent—Laemmle Appeal Dismissed—Dittenfass in Danger of Duress.

DURING the past two weeks there have been things doing in the legal line that are calculated to make the "independent" picture pirates take notice that the Motion Picture Patents Company is still on the job. The legal branch of the Patents Company has been sawing wood and saying nothing for some time. The "Independent" picture men very foolishly construed this seeming inactivity to mean that there was no chance for the Patents Company to catch them in their nefarious practices, and they have been getting careless. The result is that several of them have been caught napping; in other words, suits have been commenced in several instances for infringement of the Edison Camera Patent Reissue No. 12,037.

Miles and Steiner Sued

Concerned in these cases are The Yankee Film Company, which was formed by William Steiner and others; and the Atlas Film Company, in which Herbert Miles and his brother, Joe Miles, are interested. These companies were launched shortly after Steiner and Miles lost their licenses to handle the pictures of the Motion Picture Patents Company, and have since been making pictures of doubtful merit under the trade name of "Yankee" and "Atlas."

Supplementing the actions against the corporations, separate bills of complaint have been filed against individuals, including William Steiner, Herbert Miles, C. V. Henkle and Joe Miles. All these actions are based upon infringement of the Edison camera patents.

Individual Liability

The policy of proceeding against individuals in these infringement cases marks a new method of procedure on the part of the Patents Company in this litigation. Heretofore injunctions against corporations has not restrained individuals from continuing the business of making pictures with infringing cameras under some other corporate title. The purpose is to place the individual under the restraint of law, in which circumstance he will be personally liable if he engages in the business of pirating pictures.

Dittenfass in Danger

An example of the working of this method of procedure is fortunately at hand to illustrate the possibilities under the new method. Some time ago temporary injunctions were issued against the defunct Cameraphone Company and its principals for infringement. Since that time one of the principals, Mark Dittenfass, has, it is alleged, been guilty of violating the terms of the injunction against him. This, if true, would place him in contempt of court, an offense that is sometimes punished by imprisonment and fine or both. Just now there is a rumor going about that proceedings to punish Dittenfass will shortly be brought, in which event said Dittenfass might find himself in a very unpleasant position should the court find that he has violated the provisions of the injunction against him.

With this illustration, it can be readily seen that the suits against the individual infringers will, sooner or later, make the business of pirating picture patents an unpleasant and unpopular occupation.

After the Kessel-Bauman Crowd

Another combination of pirates to come in for a share of patent litigation is the Carleton Motion Picture Laboratories, located at Coney Island, New York, of which Bauman, of the Kessel-Bauman crowd, is the reputed president, and which is believed to be but a branch of that crowd's operations. Great pretensions have been made by the people interested in this enterprise. A number of actors and actresses, formerly employed by licensed manufacturers, have been secured at large salaries, and considerable money is supposed to have been invested in the enterprise. It is said that some very good pictures have been produced by this concern, but they have been recognized as barefaced copies of Biograph productions, or scenes stolen almost bodily from some of that company's masterpieces.

Laemmle Abandons Appeal

Another chapter in the case against the Laemmle combination, The Independent Motion Picture Company, has been recorded. It will be remembered that Laemmle appealed from the temporary injunction granted by Judge Noyes early in the year, and has ever since evaded a hearing on the appeal. Recently the attorneys of the Patents Company succeeded in compelling the defendant appellants to put the appeal down for a hearing. Last week they came into court and consented to an order dismissing the appeal.

There is but one conclusion to be drawn from this action, and that is that the attorneys of the Laemmle concern have concluded that Laemmle has no grounds upon which to base an appeal from the original restraining order. It may be taken from this that the order will stand against the "Imp" Company, and may become a positive menace to its illicit operations.

Altogether, the outlook for the pirating picuremen is not particularly encouraging.

CASUAL COMMENT

RECENT legal activity on the part of the Patents Company against several "independent" picture pirates will serve to remind those gentlemen that their position in the commercial world is somewhat precarious and uncertain.

They can never be sure that their illegal operations will not be detected and punishment for their crimes be meted out to them; yet the patent laws of the United States are such that there seems to be a premium on the theft of, and the fraudulent use of, patented devices.

The handicaps are against the owner of a patent and the difficulty of proving infringements in the motion camera cases has made the infringers doubly bold. But their very boldness promises to be their undoing. Not only will the actions have a tendency to curtail their operations, but their ability to finance their pictures will suffer. Investors have no mind to buy lawsuits, and it is hinted that several "independent" concerns would welcome the advent of some real money.

A NEW phase of this picture litigation is the action that is being taken against individuals. Actions against corporations if successful leave the creator of the convicted corporation free to continue his operations under some other title. Once the individuals are put under restraining orders, the prospect of heavy fines and jail sentences will have a wholesome effect. A motion picture of some of them doing time is not a remote possibility.

UP to now the motion picture industry has been especially fortunate in not being made the shining mark of the political grafter. But we fear it is not for long. The recent activity of certain New York politicians and a few members of a moribund exhibitors' association indicates that a raid is being organized.

These persons have become suddenly solicitous for the morals of the public, although eminent authorities on that question agree that the things the politicians want to do are well done already, and that the things which need attention ample provision has already been made by law.

This condition would indicate that the way not to have a thing properly done is to give someone authority by law to do it.

ATTENTION of exhibitors and exchange managers is directed to the "Record of Weekly Licensed Film Releases" on page 29 of this issue of The Film Index. That table contains all the titles, makers' names, character or class of subjects, length in feet and dates of release covering the licensed releases for the week of November 21-26. Blank spaces are reserved opposite each title for the serial number used by the exchange and at the end of the line a blank is provided for the exhibitor's record of the date he ran the picture in his house.

This table will be a regular feature of The Film Index with the purpose of providing exhibitors with a constant and convenient record of pictures.

It is our intention to provide a suitable binder for this record if one can be found at the right price. In the meantime exhibitors may be able to find something in the way of a suitable file at their local stationers. Suggestions are in order on this point; also regarding the addition of columns to the table for recording other information.

It will also be noticed that the current song slide releases will be found on the back of the film record. This arrangement makes both sides of the page valuable for reference and the removing and filing thereof does not injure the book for general uses.

Only another little scheme to make The Film Index a necessity in your business and give you a full two dollars' worth. You will like it.

THAT man Williams, who left the United States about a year ago and broke into the Australian picture exhibition field, is sure making some splash. He got the picture bug into his system over on the Coast and it "took" strong. Since he landed in Australia he seems to have inoculated many others, for he has built two theatres in Sydney and is projecting many more and, what is more to the point, he seems to be getting all the money he needs for his operations.

Williams has also developed a violent liking for The Film Index. Over a hundred copies are now being mailed on his order every week and, what's more, he threatens to make it 300.

This is because Williams has wisely pinned his faith to American licensed pictures, and The Film Index is the advance agent of all such.

More power to Williams.

HOPELESSLY outclassed is the present condition of the so-called "independent" picture men. The high quality of licensed pictures is generally recognized and it is only when an exhibitor imagines that he can hold his patrons, for a while at least, that he is tempted to install "independent" service because of its very low price.

The temptation is the low price—which is ridiculous to think of—and there is no chance for the "independent" exchange man to make it better. A suggestion that more should be paid invariably brings the answer: "Why pay more for 'independent' pictures when I can get trust pictures at the increased price you ask?" And so, the poor "independent" exchange man is compelled to sell his service at "junk" prices. This prevents him from buying as much as he ought and the restricted sale results in an overstocked market for "independent" films.

One Pittsburg "independent" exchange man says it is surprising what a lot of film a little real money will buy at the office of the Sales Company, and what a disturbance a "yellow back" of respectable denomination will create at the 14th street "junk shop."

PICTURES FOR HAMPTON

Chaplain H. B. Turner Purchases Edison Machine for Hampton Institute—Will Be Used for Educational Work

While in New York last week, the Rev. H. B. Turner, chaplain of Hampton Institute, Hampton, Va., purchased a latest model Edison picture machine, which will be used for educational purposes. Besides being used in the auditorium for the institution at large, class work will also be done with the aid of films.

On his visit to The Film Index, Rev. Mr. Turner acquainted us with the facts that Hampton Institute had about 1,400 students. There are nearly 100 Indians in the institution. While here, Rev. Mr. Turner took out a subscription for The Film Index, saying: "He wanted to keep up with the latest licensed pictures."

The Hampton Institute is one of the largest and best known colored institutions in the country, and many of the best known colored men of the present day have graduated from there, among them being Booker T. Washington. The school is co-educational and boasts of being one of the finest agricultural and domestic science courses in the country.

It is expected that the students from the electrical department will be taught how to operate the machine, and that the work accomplished by the use of motion pictures will receive its reward by the students of that institution.

MONS. Z. RENAUD VISITS INDEX

Mons. Z. Renaud, manager of the Gaiety photoplay theatre, Montreal, Can., was a visitor to the offices of The Film Index last Friday afternoon. Mons. Renaud seemed much pleased with the motion picture business in the "Big Town," but assured us that it had nothing on the French-Canadian town.

Mons. Renaud is manager of one of the best and most up-to-date photoplay theatres in the whole of the Dominion and takes great pride in keeping it up to the standard of the modern houses in the states. While in New York he was looking for a first class pianist—one who understood playing to pictures. He said that there were many musical artists to be found in his home city, but when it came to playing to pictures he found it hard to secure the proper person.

EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE TO HOLD BIG MEET

One of the most important business meetings of the year to be held by The Exhibitors' League, of Ohio, will take place December 5th at the Southern Hotel, Columbus, O. It is expected that nearly all the exhibitors in Ohio will be present, besides exhibitors from all parts of the country have been invited to attend.

It is the purpose of The Exhibitors' League to advance the cause of clean and moral pictures and to acquaint the general public of the value of motion pictures from every vital standpoint.

BAXTER MORTON RETURNS

Talks About Foreign Conditions—150 Powers Machines Placed Abroad

Baxter Morton, vice-president and general manager of the Nicholas Power Company, returned from a six weeks' business trip to Europe last week after establishing agencies for the Powers' Cameragraph No. 6 in the various countries abroad.

During the six weeks' trip Mr. Morton noted some general conditions of the business which he imparted to us in the course of a short conversation last week, and which we here set down briefly:

A fact that struck him most forcibly was that the picture theatre in England and on the Continent is a much more elaborate affair than in this country. Great sums of money are expended in the erection of a handsome theatre which is used for the projection of pictures only. Many of these are owned by companies who have a circuit of such houses, owners of which buy film outright instead of renting it. This film is used throughout the circuit and then rented to smaller exhibitors which, however, are in the minority.

In all houses visited he did not see a single vaudeville act. Places are devoted entirely to the photoplay at a much higher rate of admission than is charged here. In Germany, in many houses, the lowest entrance fee is a mark, which in our country would amount to approximately 25 cents, but which in Germany has a purchasing power of much more. The natural conclusion would be that picture audiences abroad are composed of a much higher class of persons than in America. A peculiar fact about the houses on the Continent is that managers who spend any amount of money on the fitting up of a theatre, neglect the installation of a second or emergency machine. They rely on one instrument, which, in case of a breakdown, causes a delay of a half-hour or so of the performance. In England, however, there are at least two machines in nearly every theatre, including small ones as well as large ones.

Regarding films, Mr. Morton said that the situation is totally unlike the one in existence in this country. There are so many manufacturers in the field that the sales of each company are very limited, excepting for the two most prominent concerns, Pathe Freres and Gaumont. The subject matter of most of the products are local in note and for that reason do not take well outside of the country in which they are made. Topicals are very popular. Pathe and Gaumont issue weekly what is known as the "Animated Gazette," being a pictorial review of the principal events. The popularity of this form of picture Mr. Morton attributes to the fact that the territory of England covers so small a space that news quickly spreads from one end to the other and is of interest to all; whereas in this country an item of interest to New York would scarcely be appreciated by San Franciscans.

Many advertising films are exhibited during a performance and are not objected to by the audience. Many of these advertise department stores, factories at work, etc. Song slides are a rare thing, but the advertising slide is much in evidence.

The result of Mr. Morton's trip was the receipt of the largest order for motion picture machines that has ever been received by a concern in this country from Europe. The Deutsche Vitascope Co., Berlin, was appointed agents for Continental Europe, and the Walturdaw Co., London, agents for the British Isles. These two concerns purchased between them 150 Powers' Cameragraph No. 6.

From the San Antonio Star.

Every season brings something new in the amusement line, but for years there has been nothing that has gained and held the popular favor like the moving picture show.

The value of a picture show lies in the fact that it is educational as well as entertaining. Scenes geographical and historical are brought before the eyes in such a way as to leave an impress on the memory that the mere reading of a printed page would never effect. A child of the plains learns in school that a mountain by definition is "a large mass of land rising above the surrounding land," and has no more conception of what a mountain really is than before. But let him see a picture show in which the scene is laid in the Alps, and he need not learn a definition, for the mere mention of the word mountain will call to his mental vision the memory of the picture he saw.

In the same way a lesson in history may be impressed upon a child's mind. He may read in his dry unillustrated text the story of Joan of Arc, or of the storming of the Alamo, and gain little from the exercise except a mechanical mastery of dates and facts. But let him see the same incidents portrayed in a series of rapidly moving films, accompanied by an explanatory lecture, and the story will become a reality to him, to be retained in memory long after the other lessons in the little thumb-marked history book have been forgotten.

Not only to the children is the picture show educational, but to the older ones as well. In the days before the art of photography reached its present development people who had not the means and opportunity for extensive traveling, even though well educated upon general lines, had extremely hazy ideas about well-known historical and geographical places. The most vivid pen picture ever written about a place can never create a definite, evact image in the mind of the reader. But a single glimpse at a photographic reproduction creates a mind picture that remains. No reproduction can be more realistic than the pictures thrown upon a screen by a good stereopticon film. A man need not travel today to be familiar with the scenic wonders of the world. For the payment of five cents he can sit for a half-hour in a quiet dark room and look upon Niagara, the Pyramids, the wildness of the jungles, the mountains, and the high seas.

The picture show brings within the reach of the poor man a cheap and profitable means of entertainment. Everybody must have recreation of some sort, and before the days of the picture show the class of people who could not pay for a high-priced entertainment were attracted to the cheap vaudevilles, which at their best exert a questionable influence over the people who frequent them. The working girl who before the picture show became common had no place to spend her leisure evenings, now meets her chum at the gate and makes the rounds of the five cent shows. In the same way the working boys who formerly sought amusement in the bar rooms and billiard halls now take their best girls to see the moving pictures. Rich and poor alike patronize them; the banker's daughter jostles elbows with her mother's kitchen maid as the crowd throngs the entrance. Yet it is after all the poor man who gets the most benefit from it.

It is true that many pictures are shown at the average show which have no other object than to provoke a laugh. It is also true that there are far too many moving pictures whose influence over the young mind is anything but good—especially such films as the highway robber and Diamond Dick variety. But every effort is being made by those who recognize the real good the picture shows are doing to suppress all that is questionable or suggestive. The suppression of the exhibition of the Reno prize fight films in so many of the states is a proof of this. The time will come when the popular taste will demand the exclusion of all questionable films, for the tendency is in that direction now.

San Antonio is well supplied with up-to-date picture shows, all of which do a flourishing business the year round. Every day they offer a change of program. The rooms are cool, quiet, well-ventilated and supplied with plenty of exits. The films are of the latest that can be procured, and are almost invariably of unquestionable moral tone. Everybody in San Antonio goes to the picture shows, and comes away thinking he has got his money's worth.

CHANGES NAME OF NEW THEATRE.

The management of the Bijou photoplay theatre, Calumet, Mich., has announced that it will change the name of this popular playhouse, and that on Nov. 17th, it will be known as the "Crown Family Theatre."

It is the intention to give a grand opening under the new name, a special program having been arranged for the occasion. The Tamarack band has been engaged to furnish music on Thursday the "christening night," while Ben Gettelman, of Hancock, the popular violinist, will render a couple of violin selections. Ad. and Tess Abbott will sing, and there will be a special program of motion pictures.

NOVELTY THEATRE, PORTERSVILLE, CAL., ENLARGED.

Work on a better and larger Novelty Theatre, Portersville, Cal., will begin in the very near future. The old building is to be entirely remodeled; will be sixteen feet wider and several feet higher. An ornamental plaster front will take the place of the wooden facing now in place.

Manager Godley, of the Novelty and Airdome, expects the work on the former to be completed in about three weeks, and the Airdome will then be closed for the winter.

A more commodious stage that will be put in will afford room for various vaudeville companies that may be engaged during the winter.

Loew's National Theatre, situated at Bergen avenue and 149th street, New York City, has completed negotiations with Nicholas Power Co. for the installing of a Powers No. 6 machine and a Powers adjustable inductor.

EDISON DRAMA AND COMEDY

Forthcoming Productions of Interest—A White Plague Picture

AMONG the forthcoming licensed dramatic releases a subject that is certain to attract attention will be found under the Edison trade-mark and the title "The Captain's Bride." This is a dramatization of John Luther Long's story of the same title. The pictured version is a delightful blending of comedy and drama, heightened by some excellent scenic effects. The picture story begins with a pretty lover's scene in a Western setting. The cowboy lover appears at the window and playfully "holds up" his sweetheart, who in turn gets the "drop" on him and causes him to deliver an engagement ring, after which she yields proper compensation.

Subsequently this couple are on their wedding trip and aboard a ship. There is a storm and the ship is wrecked. Life savers at the station on shore succeed in reaching the wreck, but only a single woman is found aboard, all others having left the ship, even to the husband. With great difficulty the captain of the life-saving crew gets the woman ashore. She recovers from the effects of exposure and is the object of much curious admiration from a crew of life savers. These rugged men of the sea join in making the young woman comfortable at her temporary abode in the captain's cabin. Eventually it occurs to them that she ought to marry some one of them, and they lose no time in putting the proposition to her. The crew lines up in their cabin looking their best and the young woman looks them over. Rejecting all of them until she comes to the captain, and to him she gives her heart. It should have been mentioned before that one of the effects of the disaster upon the young woman was to leave her mind a blank as to her past life. She does not even remember her name or any of the incidents concerning the disaster.

It having been decided that she was to marry the captain, all arrangements are made and the party proceeds to the church for the ceremony. Just then the husband of the young woman, who chanced to be saved from the wreck, appears on the scene and recognizes his wife. There is a stop in the proceedings, an explanation, and finally a recollection on the part of the woman; and, of course, the intended wedding is off. The captain is left sitting on the rocks and gazing out to sea with only a recollection of his bride that was to be.

PIGS IS PIGS.

In a version of Ellis Parker Butler's sketch "Pigs Is Pigs," the Edison players have built up a comedy that will be appreciated by picture lovers. The incident around which the story was written and upon which the picture has been constructed, illustrates the working of the circumlocution office of modern express and railway companies. A. J. Moorehouse buys two guinea pigs for his son. The pigs are shipped by express and charged at 30 cents each, which is the tariff for pigs. Moorehouse protests that these are not pigs but pets, for which the tariff is only 25 cents each, and Mike Flannery, the agent, and Moorehouse have a heated argument on the subject. An acrimonious correspondence ensues, extending for a considerable period of time. The Edison players show us just how these letters pass around from hand to hand and from department to department with the usual celerity which marks the progress of such matters.

In the mean time things are happening at the express office. The reproducing powers of guinea pigs is proverbial and this pair are living up to the traditions of their kind with the result that Mike Flannery, the agent, is kept busy enlarging their pen and feeding them "cabbiges." But the end comes at last. The traffic department of the Interurban Express Company decides that guinea pigs are "pets," and allows the 25 cents charge. The pigs are now 100 in number and Moorehouse absolutely refuses to accept the consignment. Flannery advises headquarters of this decision and wants to know who is going to pay him $18,95 for "cabbiges" and appends a postscript with this query: "What if they was elephants."

It is something of an achievement to have evolved so interesting a picture from so unpromising a subject, but when you see it on the screen, you will agree that it is good.

A MOUNTAIN MAID.

Here is a very pleasing comedy drama with a delightful love story and a few interesting situations set amid some very pretty pastoral scenes. The leading man and leading woman in a theatrical production entitled "The Mountain Maid," entirely unacquainted with each other, separately decide to visit the mountains of Tennessee for local color and atmosphere. Departing separately they, by strange coincidence, arrive at the same locality where a summer flirtation progresses. In their wandering about the mountains they stumble upon a moonshiner's cache and the young man is suspected of being a "revenue" and warned out of the country. The girl overhears the plot to kill him and succeeds in getting him away in time.

The concluding scenes happen at the theatre where rehearsals for the theatrical production "A Mountain Maid" are about to begin. The finish is very effective and is as clearly told in the pictures as could be expressed in any other form of language.

AMATEUR NIGHT.

This is an old subject that has been done many times in pictures in the "slap stick past," but this picture is different and will be highly appreciated by the lovers of good farce comedy. It is, in part, like the amateur nights that you have seen, but through this story runs the ambitions of a young woman dramatically inclined, also the hopes of her lover temporarily cast down by the aforesaid dramatic ambition. The young man wins in the end, but the events that lead up to his final victory are extremely amusing.

A White Plague Picture is announced for early release by the Edison Company. The picture on the Red Cross movement to prevent tuberculosis. This picture was produced by the Edison Company in co-operation with the National Association for the Prevention and Cure of Tuberculosis and the American National Red Cross. The object of this picture, which is to be released about Dec. 16, is to stimulate the sale of red cross stamps at that season, and also to bring closer to the public facts concerning the fight against the great white plague. More will be said about this picture in the next issue of The Film Index.

Instead of building a $7,500 motion picture theatre on North avenue, between 33d and 34th streets, Milwaukee, Wis., Rice & Glinberg will erect a $9,000 building for the same purpose at 33d street and North avenue.

BAY SHORE HOUSE SOLD.

W. D. Eccleston, of Bay Shore, N. Y., has purchased the Casino from Emmanuel Strauss and with A. J. Mueller will run motion pictures and vaudeville in that house. The house is soon to undergo extensive repairs which should make it up-to-date in every respect.

There will be a new picture machine added and also an orchestra put in. It is the intention of the managers to put on only the best of pictures and high class vaudeville, as the price of admission will assure such.

HARTFORD, MICH., TO HAVE NEW THEATRE.

M. G. Hotchkiss of South Haven, Mich., has just completed plans for the erection of a first class photoplay theatre at Hartford, Mich. Hartford has only one photoplay theatre which is open but one night a week—Saturday, and as the town is large enough to support a performance nightly, Mr. Hotchkiss has taken advantage to get a good location for a first class place. The pictures will be of the latest licensed films, and a complete change will be made at least twice a week. H. L. Brown will manage the new house.

SENSATIONAL AMERICAN PATHE

Based on Indian Legend of Niagara Falls—Another War Drama

NIAGARA FALLS has inspired with awe and wonder countless thousands who have journeyed from the ends of the earth to observe this wonderful manifestation of nature; to the simple and superstitious mind of the Indian, Niagara partook of the supernatural. To the unschooled red men it became a god to be worshiped and placated. So great was the reverence of the Father of Waters that sacrifice was made to the Spirit of Niagara by the Indians every year. The tradition is that the tribes assembled annually and offered unto the spirit the choicest fruits of field and chase, together with a beautiful Indian maiden, chosen by savage rites, for the sacrifice. Around this legend the Pathe American players have constructed a most interesting picture. The young Indian brave falls in love with the beautiful daughter of the chief. She is accepted by him, but when he applies to the father, he is rejected because he is not a chief, and no other shall wed the chief's daughter.

SCENE FROM "MAID OF NIAGARA."

At this point in the story, a messenger from a neighboring tribe announces that there will be a tournament of sports at which all aspiring young braves are invited to attend and compete. The Indian lover is foremost in the contest. We see him winning the trial at skill with the bow and arrow, the swimming races and the horse races and bringing home the laurels of the event to his tribe, where he is received with great acclaim, and where the old chief passes to him the war bonnet, which proclaims him the leader of his tribe, and at the same time makes him eligible to the hand of the chief's daughter.

It is now time to choose the sacrifice to the Spirit of the Great Waters. The maidens of the tribe are seated in a row; an arrow is to be shot into the air, and the one before whose feet it falls is to be the sacrifice. The bow is handed to the young chief. With some misgivings he shoots the shaft and then sees it fall at the feet of his promised bride. True to the traditions of her tribe the girl accepts the mission, but the young chief would have her escape with him. He pleads in vain, and he finally accompanies her to the river where she embarks in her canoe for the final accomplishment of her mission. We see her paddle through the raging rapids and then floating swiftly over the awful brink to disappear in the mists of the falling waters. Blindly the lover wanders along the banks of the river in search of his bride and finally comes upon her body, which has been washed upon the shore. Having no further desire to live he decides to accompany his sweetheart to the land of the Great Spirit and so throws himself into the rapids and disappears.

In this picture the Pathe players have incorporated scenes from Niagara Falls. It is a real canoe that is shown shooting down the rapids and over the brink to be buried in the mists and spray of the plunging water. Niagara Falls has a charm that is never dispelled by familiarity and the scenes shown will be pleasantly remembered by the thousands who have visited that wonderful scene. The story throughout is animated and the photography is unusually clear and sharp. There are some beautiful natural scenes and the back grounds have, for the most part, been well chosen. It is a picture that should please the patrons of the photoplay.

AN ELEVENTH HOUR REDEMPTION.

Under this title, "An Eleventh Hour Redemption," the Pathe American players have portrayed an episode of the Civil War that might have happened. According to the story, two brothers are in love with the same girl. Of course, only one of them gets her. The other ought to have given up, but he didn't, and the result is a number of intensely dramatic scenes which are well carried off by the Pathe players.

In the course of events the husband is seriously injured by falling from a horse. He is taken to his home and found to be in such serious condition that absolute quiet is prescribed and so slender is his hold on life that a severe shock will kill him. The brother happens in just at this critical period and overcome by his passionate love for his brother's wife creates a scene which results in the injured man's death and the brother's banishment from the house. Cursing his ill luck and realizing that he is beyond the pale, the brother enlists in the army. Years afterwards he gains rank and is fighting its battles when he is fatally wounded and carried to the old home of his brother, near which the battle occurred. In his nurse he recognizes the features of the woman he once loved and bringing out an old photograph of her learns that the girl is the daughter of that woman. The mother is called and recognizes in the wounded man the brother who was the cause of her husband's death. A rather affecting scene is here enacted, closing with the death of the wounded officer.

MAINE CHURCH SHOWS MOTION PICTURES.

For the first time in the history of Maine motion pictures were shown at a church service last Sunday night. These pictures were taken from the life of Moses and were thrown on a screen at the First Baptist church, Skowhegan. Long before the service began, both the main auditorium and Sunday school room were packed to the doors and many people were turned away. Pastor Robert Morris was so well pleased with the pictures and size of the congregation, that he has decided to put on more Biblical subjects in the near future.

Pastor Morris is said to be one of the most modern ministers in the "Pine Tree" state and thoroughly believes in giving his people all that is up-to-date in the way of sermons. He has now found that the motion picture is of vital importance in the Christian teachings and is going to do much for the uplift of his community. A full church to him brings results, and if the Biblical pictures have a means of enlarging his congregation, he will put forth every effort to get them and also use them to the best advantage.

GLOBE PHOTOPLAY THEATRE SOLD

Charles Higginbotham Purchases Picture House at Holyoke, Mass.

Papers have been passed for the transfer of the Globe theatre in the Rackliffe building on Suffolk street, Holyoke, Mass., from Woods & Cavanaugh to Charles Higginbotham, proprietor of the Grand theatre on High street. First denial of negotiations or the sale were made by the old Globe management when the rumors of sale were first current. Mr. Higginbotham took possession of the theatre Nov. 10.

It is expected that Mr. Higginbotham will reduce the admission fee at this theatre to five cents, the rate at the Grand, and most of the other motion picture houses of the city.

That a movement is on foot to form a combine of the motion picture houses of the city is rumored. The effort is made, it is understood with a view to being able eventually to raise the price of admission in all the houses to 10 cents.

The Globe theatre, opened two seasons ago, is considered one of the model small theatres of the western part of the state. Woods & Cavanaugh spared no expense in making it a model house, with tasteful decorations, fine ventilating, lighting and seating arrangements.

John H. Woods, of the old management will devote himself entirely to his real estate business and Timothy Cavanaugh is planning to leave Holyoke.

Arthur T. Voight is building a $12,000 photoplay theatre at 160 Underhill avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Magnet theatre, Main street, Annapolis, Md., formerly owned by P. B. Cooper, has been leased by Rosenthal & Laborwits, of Baltimore.

WASHINGTON TIMES INVESTIGATION.

Report of Rev. John Van Schaick, Jr., and Mrs. Edna Bushee of Public Schools.

By the Rev. John Van Schaick, Jr., Pastor of Church of Our Father.

I have visited five of Washington's motion picture theatres once. I visited them all on the same evening. I have done no other investigating. My knowledge, therefore, of this subject is partial and imperfect, but it is altogether in favor of the theatres.

I must acknowledge frankly that I went to these theatres with reluctance, that I dreaded the vulgarity of which I have heard so much, that I expected to be bored, but that, on the contrary, I was instructed, entertained and pleased.

In the first place, they were patronized by decent, well-behaved, and even refined folks. In the one colored theatre we attended I was especially impressed by the intelligent lot of people I saw file out when the performance was over. There were husbands and wives, and mothers with their children, as well as children alone. There were men who were unmistakably laboring men. There were representatives of all ages and many classes.

They all conducted themselves like ladies and gentlemen.

In the second place, the ventilation was good and the exits adequate in case of fire. The health officer remarked that he had never found any lot of people more willing to conform with the regulations or suggestions of his department than the promoters of these places. Undoubtedly some of these managers will get careless and will need to be held up to the mark, but the sanitary difficulties are no greater than anywhere else that people assemble.

Now, as to the amusement itself, I am compelled to speak in high praise. This is not an unqualified indorsement; I intend to look further; but on the basis of five visits to five places widely scattered, I must say that I doubt if the moral tone of the high-priced theatres would average as well.

There were some things silly, of course, and some grotesque, unreal and exaggerated. There were some things I would not show if I were running the business. But there was a deal of real instruction, much of the appeal to imagination and emotion, and what is vastly more important, so far as these places go, amusement.

That is what the masses need—rational amusement which amuses. It must be near by. It must be cheap. It must quicken and stimulate the man or woman who is dead tired by the monotony of his toil. If the 5-cent theatre does all these things, it is a benefactor of the race. If it does not, something else must be found to take its place. The need for amusement is a real one and must be met.

In his "New Basis of Civilization," Prof. Patten, of the University of Pensylvania, says this:

"Vice must be fought by welfare, not by restraint. Society is not safe until today's pleasures are stronger than its temptations. Men must enjoy and emphasis should be laid again upon amusement so extended and thorough that primitive people may be incorporated by its manifold activities into the industrial world. * * * Amusement is stronger than vice and can stifle the lust of it. It is a base of economic efficiency upon which depends the progress of the multitudes."

In other words, changing conditions are changing men and not always for the best. Once a man fought all day against wind or wave or trackless forest for the chance to send his spear into a bear or fish. What he did roused every faculty and power. Now that man's children, perhaps, punch all day at one machine and face the monotony of making the same hole, in the same way, in the same fabric, half a million times a year.

All the forces which co-operate to save the man from becoming a machine are religious. Amusement is one of these. I wish we had more theatres and that they took from the people more money and that they involved an expenditure of more time, for unless they were of a very bad sort, we should then have a better race. And I wish that we had more playgrounds of various kinds for adults as well as children, and that all know how to play as well as work.

By Mrs. Edna Keene Bushee, Chief Attendance Officer of the Public Schools.

As a substitue for something worse, the 5-cent theatre is no doubt a good thing. Standing alone, however, it possesses many features which tend to lower the standards and hurt the morals of our children.

The pictures themselves have, no doubt, improved during the past two years, but the theatres have increased in number, and their springing up represents in a large measure the waste earnings of those who can least afford it. In families where the children are only half clothed and half fed, the amount spent in 5-cent shows would sound appalling to us.

I know boys, a large number of them, who, making 35 cents per day selling papers, spend two-thirds of it in these theatres. I know children who, evening after evening, visit these places, and are away from their homes until the late hours of the night without the supervision of any older person and without any knowledge on the part of the parent, except the statement that they are going to the 5-cent shows.

You may say that this is due to lack of parental control and home conditions, and that is true, but these places, large in number as they are, easy of access to the homes, within the reach of all financially, serve as meeting places for girls and boys who, in many instances would not be allowed by their parents to run the streets, but who in reality do so under the pretext of attending the 5-cent shows.

So far as my knowledge of these places is concerned, I have never seen an obscene picture in one of them. I have seen pictures, however, which I should consider highly demoralizing for children, and, while not so hurtful, perhaps, in their effect upon older people, certainly have nothing of uplift in them and tend to lower standards of morality.

We have heard much said against the yellow-backed novels, the "Diamond Dick" and other stories, which have lured so many boys from their home and incited those of adventurous minds to deeds of dangerous daring, but, in my opinion, their influence is as nothing compared with that of the motion picture shows. In each of four theatres which I visited in one day there were shown dramas, tragedies, stories of the West, and in each of them, with but one exception, there was depicted the wildest of passion, bloodshed and vengeance. There is evidently an eager desire to gratify and create the demand for sensationalism and to make appeal to the basest passions. In only two of these places out of a dozen visited have I seen anything that might be considered educational.

I saw children, almost babies, there with their mothers. Going in and out were young girls and boys, apparently on their way from school; children ranging from twelve to sixteen years, unattended by any adult, drinking in with eagerness, the stories told by the pictures, laughing at the coarsest and cheapest of humor, and discussing it all excitedly when leaving the place.

But I would not have the 5-cent theatres abolished; they may be made a great power for good. It has been said that they preserve the family unit, and to some extent, I believe they do. Pleasure, in my opinion, is as necessary in life as work, and the cheapness of this pleasure brings it within the reach of all.

AN HISTORICAL INDIAN PICTURE

From The Kalem Reservation

THE Kalem Company have arranged for an early release of another very interesting historical Indian subject of which the title is "Elder Alden's Indian Ward." It is a little different from some of the previous pictured stories of this sort issued by the Kalem Company in that it illustrates a peculiar phase of Indian character supposed to have existed among the earlier redmen with which America's settlers had to deal.

Elder Alden was one of the early Puritan pioneers of Massachusetts. In those days the Narragansett Indians were a rather fierce and war-like tribe, though there are cases on record in which the Puritan succeeded in exerting a civilizing influence over the redman. According to the story in the picture, which is a liberal adaptation of some of the New England legends. Chief Squantom having conceived a friendly feeling for Elder Alden and his family, thought to have his son brought up amid influences of the white men. He therefore sought Elder Alden, and in his stolid Indian manner, conveyed to the old Puritan the desire that his son should be adopted into the white man's family and educated in the white man's way. Having completed the formalities of the adoption, which were primitive and brief, the old Chief Squantom departed to his tribe.

Years afterward, the young Indian arriving at manhood, rebels against the white man's ways and refuses to work. He realizes that he is the son of a chief and the Indian traditions assert themselves. There is a daughter in the Alden's who has also grown to womanhood and beauty, and the young Indian demands her as his squaw. For this, and his unwillingness to bear his share of the toil, he is cast out of the Alden family and departs swearing vengeance. Returning to the people of his father, the young Indian incites them to attack the whites. His father attempts to prevent the attack, but he fails, and then hurries to the cabin of the Aldens to warn them of the impending danger. The house is quickly barricaded and prepared for defense just as the band of Indians arrive. The Indians succeed in breaking into the cabin. A fierce fight ensues, during which the Indian father kills his son to save the lives of the Aldens. After this the Indians are quickly dispersed. The old Chief Squantom remains. In the melee he has received a fatal wound, and soon dies from the effects, falling upon the body of his son.

SCENE FROM KALEM'S HISTORICAL INDIAN SUBJECT "ELDER ALDEN'S INDIAN WARD."

Tired and discouraged mothers with their young children, who could not possibly afford to take them to any more expensive amusement, can get away from their household cares and worries for an hour or two in the evening. Men who have social natures, and who might otherwise spend their time in the saloon, gather here and for a time forget their work and their heavy responsibilities and go back to their families less out of pocket, more masters of themselves than if they had spent the evening elsewhere.

I would, however, ask for a reduction and restriction in their number, a strict censorship—and the elimination of vaudeville acts where young children perform.

With these safeguards I believe that the motion picture shows could be made to take their proper place as one of the greatest powers for good in the city of Washington.

NEW PRINCESS A BEAUTIFUL HOUSE

Denver's Newest Photoplay Theatre Claimed To Be the Finest in America—Perhaps World.

The New Princess, Denver's newest photoplay theatre, which opened October 11, is one of the finest and most up-to-date theatres of its kind in the country. As a place of art and luxury few metropolitan theatres can boast of its equal and for safety it has all the modern appliances.

The house is owned by the Princess Amusement Company, of which George C. Moore is president and George H. Greaves is secretary and manager, and A. P. Mackey is treasurer. To build and equip a house like the New Princess cost over $125,000, and it was the owners' boast that it excels any house of its kind in America, if not in the world. All three owners are men of long and wide experience in the motion picture game and know what the public demand along such amusement lines.

Messrs. Moore and Greaves are by no means strangers to the citizens of Denver; they have been in that city for the past four years—doing business in such a manner that the whole theatre going public know what class of entertainment these men furnish to their patrons. They were the first managers to put on the five cent picture show and to make it pay. When they started such entertainments they were ridiculed by other managers, but in spite of all that was said or done Messrs. Moore and Greaves kept giving the public straight pictures, only the best, and in the end won out.

Besides having the best pictures obtainable, Mr. Greaves is a believer in having the best music. He has spared no expense in that line of entertainment. The Biehl Ladies' Symphony orchestra, that has won much fame throughout the west, have been engaged for the entire season. Mr. Tomkins, one of Denver's favorite tenors, has also been engaged to sing all the popular songs.

TREATY SAVES ITALIANS.

An international treaty, negotiated between Italy and the United States, forty years ago, has been resurrected by the Italian consul general for the purpose of keeping open 100 motion picture theatres owned by Italian residents of the East Side, New York City.

The last session of the state legislature passed a law restricting moving picture licenses to American citizens only. As a result about 100 Italians were notified that they would have to close up their places of business. The Italians at once complained to the Italian consul general at New York.

He found that the treaty of 1871 between the two countries gave to all Italian subjects in this country the same rights to personal property as American citizens. This, he claimed invalidated the new law so far as it pertained to Italians. His claim has just received the official O. K. of the city's legal experts.

"LOVE, LUCK AND GASOLINE"

A Vitagraph Life Portrayal and Novel Feature Film

LOVE and luck are a good combination; where one is lucky at love he generally makes a good start, but the question arises—what has gasoline to do with it? That's just what this picture tells you; follow the story and you will learn where it comes in and helps things out amazingly.

It is not strange that a young man and woman are in love with each other and it is less strange if the young lady, like this one in the picture, is attractive and accomplished, that another man wants her to marry him. Naturally the young woman prefers the young man and rejects the second party who is a great deal older than herself. Her father favors the old beau and tries to prevent his daughter marrying "Bob" but "dada" can't get the young folks to see it that way at all and they "take the bull by the horns" and elope—not in the usual way, in an autocar or behind a pair of fast horses. They elope in a motor boat and the father and the "villain" pursue them in another motor boat. Both boats are beauties and they make a pretty picture as they skim through the water and the race gets interesting and exciting. Now do you see where the gasoline comes in?

If you have ever sailed in a motor boat you will appreciate this race; if you haven't, you will see something worth seeing as the boats glide over the bounding billows of Long Island Sound—the first one on which we see Bob and Mollie bound for Newport and the second one in pursuit, Mollie's father and the antiquated lover ever eagerly peering at the graceful "Esmeralda" as she leads the chase.

Accidents will happen but how unfortunate at this moment; the "Esmeralda's" machinery goes wrong and the "Ethel" is fast gaining on her. The wireless! The "Esmeralda" has its own instrument and Bob wires the Rev. Jones to get the skipper of the "Vita" who is a friend of Bob's, to bring him to the "Esmeralda" at once and marry Mollie and him.

Now here is where the gasoline comes in right. The "Vita" is a speed motor boat of the launch pattern and the skipper knows how to run it to the last ounce of pressure and get it across the line far in the lead. "All aboard"! and the "Vita" is off like a streak, as the Rev. Jones wraps his rubber coat more closely about him to protect himself from the spray thrown from the prow in a shower of white foam. Gee! How she can "leg it." Watch the little craft as she goes through and over the water like a bird through the air. It doesn't seem possible.

Don't forget Bob and Mollie—just look how anxiously they are watching the approach of the "Ethel" and the "Vita." It all depends upon the little boat's speed to pass the "Ethel" and outwit the irate father and his preferred future son-in-law. Can she do it? Nothing to it but the "Vita," she's up with the pursuers; she's passing them and they are out of the race now, the little flyer is along side the "Esmeralda" taking Bob and Mollie on board. This delay gives the "Ethel" a chance to get within hailing distance but that's all. The race is on again and you find yourself getting in it with both feet and saying to yourself: "Go it, 'Vita,' Go it!!"

While the little "Vita" is chugging on its way the Rev. Jones is there with the tie that binds two loving hearts into a knot that makes the two one and now that Mollie and Bob are married we know they have won and it's all over but the shouting. We do it with a will. You can't help it.

There is a go to this picture and it carries you right along with it. At the same time it is so real, so novel and bewitching, so unlike anything you have ever seen, those who see it will consider themselves in luck and in love with it.

PROCEEDS FOR FOOT BALL TEAM.

The Wilmington High School Football team of Wilmington, N. C., were given the proceeds of two photoplay shows last week, by the manager of the Joyland theatre. The manager, who is an old football player, gave the boys tickets to sell to high school pupils and when the time came for the performance there had been more tickets sold than seats.

It is claimed that the proceeds of the two performances will nearly equip the team with uniforms.

CHICAGO LETTER

By James S McQuade

I HAVE just finished reading an attractive brochure, neatly printed and handsomely illustrated, gotten out as an announcement of the opening of the high class picture theatre, the Kursaal, in Bexhill, near London, England. This theatre is one of a circuit of four first class houses owned by the Picture Theatres, Limited, of London, which was organized to build and conduct a string of modern, motion picture theatres that would appeal to the best class of patrons, because of the special arrangements made for the accommodation and comfort of visitors.

To quote from the folder, "The Kursaal is admirably appointed in every way, comfortably seated, having ample cloak room accommodation and retiring rooms, as well as spacious tea and refreshment rooms, affording that ease and comfort to patrons which so much enhances the enjoyment of an evening's amusement." The management built the Kursaal with a view of providing the good people of Bexhill with a picture theatre of the highest class, where the evidences of refinement could be seen in the surroundings as well as in the entertainment.

The Kensington picture theatre, which was opened in October, 1909, by the same Company and built and conducted on the plan to be followed by the Kursaal, has met with hearty support and has proved a great success in every way, although the prices charged have been fully double those of most of the other picture theatres. "It has been filled daily several times over, with patrons of the highest class, many of them being members of the aristocracy."

The daily program of the Kursaal for the winter months from 10 a. m. till 10 p. m., will be as follows: From 10 a. m. till 1 p. m., the free use of the hall for visitors, for reading, sewing, etc., the gramaphone and music being heard at intervals. From 1:15 p. m. till 3 p. m. there will be matinees of pictures on Wednesdays and Saturdays only, at 12, 24 and 48 cents, children being admitted at half price. From 3 p. m. till 6 p. m. a continuous show of pictures, daily, prices being as above. From 6 p. m. to 8 p. m. the hall is free, as between 10 a. m. and 1 p. m., and from 8 p. m. to 10 p. m. pictures, etc. will be offered as between 3 p. m. and 6 p. m. at the same prices. On Sundays the theatre opens at noon and is free until 3 p. m., when a continuous program of special film, embracing religious, travel and industry subjects, will be presented with appropriate music. As a special inducement, school pupils and their guardians, of any age, are admitted at half price, on all occasions.

The Picture Theatres, Limited, has a capital of 50,000 pounds sterling ($250,000), the preference shares being entitled to 10 per cent. preferential interest and to half of the remaining profits after provision has been made for the reserve fund.

I have entered thus fully into a description of the new standard type of picture theatre in England, in order to acquaint readers with the progress being made there, and, at the same time, to institute a comparison with the conditions in America. If we are not too much given to optimism, I believe we must confess that the great stumbling block in the way of our greater progress in the exhibition of pictures is the large number of inferior theatres prevailing at present. True, we can boast of some magnificent picture theatres in Milwaukee, Denver and elsewhere, but they are notable exceptions. The great majority are unworthy the dignity of motion picture entertainment and, until larger and more inviting theatres are erected, exhibitors may expect to lose a considerable percentage of the attendance which would be theirs had they roomier and better appointed houses.

Unfortunately, the ordinances in force in many cities bar a great many ambitious exhibitors from enlarging their houses over a capacity of 300, unless conforming with street and alley requirements; but, in the near future, capital will find a good paying investment in the erection of first class theatres, in which motion pictures, fine orchestral music and operatic singing acts will draw large and remunerative business. In cities like New York and Chicago, real estate is held at such enormous values that, considering the prices to which the store theatres have accustomed picture theatre goers, it would be foolhardy to erect a first class picture theatre unless a new policy were adopted in the standard of entertainment and in the schedule of prices. Fine orchestral music and singing numbers of operatic caliber are the true associates for motion pictures, and with these a first class picture theatre can command the proper prices and win out. Illustrated songs, like cheap vaudeville, have had their day.

Who will be the pioneer to blaze the way for a circuit of picture theatres of the highest class in America?

Police Censorship of Popular Songs.

The police censorship of popular songs was ordered by Chief of Police Stewart, of this city, Monday, Nov. 14. The Chief's attention has been directed recently to the objectionable nature of a large number of songs sung at present, in certain cafes and nickel theatres, and after examination of several songs submitted to him he took action as stated.

These songs, it appears, are cleverly worded, so as to evade the actual charge of obscenity; but, speaking of one of them, the chorus of which he read to Assistant Chief Schuettler, Chief Stewart said: "It is so suggestive when accompanied by suggestive action that even grown men ought not to listen to it, and certainly it ought not to be sung in the cafes and nickel shows where women and children go. They're all just as bad. In black and white you can't lay your finger on actual obscenity, but when motions and emphasis are used there is no mistaking the meaning."

The Chief then directed the Assistant Chief as follows: "Have your theatrical bureau go to the publishers of these songs and say that the sale of them must be stopped and that the singing of them must be stopped. Also serve notice on the cafes and as many nickel theatres as possible that these songs and any others of the same nature are barred. If the notices are not obeyed we shall take more severe action."

The new censorship started Tuesday, Nov. 15, under the direction of Sergeant Charles O'Donnell of the theatrical bureau.

So far as my experience goes, I have not yet heard a song of the type referred to sung in any licensed theatre visited, but then it must be remembered that my visits have been confined to theatres of the better class. I know a large number of licensed exhibitors in Chicago and from what I have learned of them they are jealous to a man of the reputation and good conduct of their house management. Each of these exhibitors makes it a specialty to cater to the family and to ladies and children especially; and, apart from the question of morals, they know that it pays to keep their programs up to a high moral standard.

Now that pictures are exhibited in lighted auditoriums and that the spirit of progress is manifest in all along the line, it would be deplorable if a few, unprincipled, catch-penny managers were permitted to introduce songs of a vicious character. All success, therefore, to Sergeant O'Donnell in his efforts to suppress the shady song in picture theatres.

An Artistic Selig Poster.

The poster gotten out for Selig's great film, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," is a veritable work of art in litho design and coloring. The amorous Falstaff is shown in the center of the picture, with the two "merry wives," Mistresses Ford and Page, on his right and left. The nice harmonizing of colors in this poster and its just claim to the distinction of "class" will make it a striking advertisement in any theatre lobby or display window. Exhibitors should use it liberally for Selig's big release on Thanksgiving Day.

Orpheum, South Bend, Ind., Opened.

The Orpheum theatre, South Bend, Ind., was opened Monday evening, Nov. 14, under the most flattering auspices. This house, which is operated under the direction of the Allardt Bros. and the F. & H. Amusement Co., is on the circuit of houses comprising the Orpheum, Champain, Ill.; the Lyric, Danville, Ill.; the Lyric, Elkhart, Ind., and the Orpheum, Gary, Ind., all controlled and operated by the aforementioned.

Invitations to the opening were issued in steel engraving, on superfine letter paper, and mailed to a large circle of friends, acquaintances and business associates throughout the Middle West. Quite a number were sent to Chicago people, many of whom attended, careful arrangements having been made for sleeping car accommodations on the return trip, the following morning by C. J. Allardt, manager of the Orpheum.

The Orpheum runs two reels of licensed pictures daily and vaudeville, booked by the Western Vaudeville Managers' Association. The opening, from all accounts received, was a signal success, and the house was packed by an enthusiastic audience of the best people in South Bend.

Successful Opening of New Comet Theatre.

The New Comet theatre at Creston, Ia., was opened Nov. 10 before an audience that numbered over 1200. Two reels of licensed pictures and one vaudeville act formed the program, which was strongly supplemented by the Red Oak orchestra. Quite a large contingent from Red Oak attended the performance.

Local Manager H. L. Tucker presented everyone in attendance with a handsome souvenir card program, the upper portion of which bore an attractive litho. engraving in colors, the lower containing the program. In the upper left corner of each program a beautiful rose was fastened, a pretty favor that was highly appreciated by each recipient.

"A Mexican Legend" (Pathe) and "The Vampire" (Selig) were the films presented, each being greeted with applause by the delighted audience. The New Comet is owned by the Comet Amusement Co., which has headquarters at Red Oak, Ia., and which is now operating a flourishing circuit of houses.

Chicago Film Brevities.

On Thursday, Nov. 10, in the Superior Court, before Judge Dupuy, the American Film Manufacturing Co., against which a preliminary order for injunction was applied for by the American Film Service, on the charge of infringement of title, asked for a continuance, which was granted.

K. W. Linn, Western manager of the Pathe Freres, has changed the day for the inspection of film by the Chicago Censor Board from Tuesday to Friday. Henceforth the exhibitions will begin on Fridays at 10 o'clock a. m., sharp, when the pictures for the following week will be shown. Exhibitors and other licensed people interested are cordially invited to attend these demonstrations.

I. Van Ronkel, manager of the General Film Co., 77 South Clark street, received the following telegram last week from Franklin Fox, owner and manager of the Irwin Opera House, Goshen, Ind.: "Your generous consideration and splendid service has kept this theatre open for the past two years. Many thanks."

The Board of Education of San Francisco has selected the Pathe professional machine, exclusively, for public school use, so I have been informed by K. W. Linn, of the Pathe office here. Mr. Linn states that the sales on the Coast at present exceed those of any previous period.

J. E. Willis, formerly manager of the Kleine Optical Co., New York, and now manager of the General Film Co., Cleveland, O., was in the city last week on a sad mission. Mr. and Mrs. Willis came here to take charge of the body of Mr. Willis' brother, who died at St. Joseph's hospital, this city, after an operation had been made to relieve an ailment from which he had been suffering for a number of years. His body was taken to Cleveland for burial.

W. H. Cadoret, owner and manager of the La Petite theatre, in Kankakee, Ill., was a visitor last week and informed me that he had enlarged his house so as to include 100 additional seats. It now seats 400 people. The remodeling will be finished towards the close of the week of Nov. 14. Manager Cadoret has installed a fine mirror screen, and a well lighted auditorium will add to the pleasure of his

"LOVE'S AWAKENING"

Comedy Drama by Essanay

JAS. S. McQUADE

ESSANAY'S Eastern stock company has now gotten into fine working fettle under the guiding hand of Producer McCrea Webster, and the many admirers of Essanay comedies throughout the world may look forward to a harvest of good things in the near future. As I understand it, the aim of the Eastern Company will be to produce comedy subjects of uniform excellence right along and avoid the straining after feature films, when such effort might affect the standard of the average product. Feature comedy films will be produced, as they always have been, by the Essanay Co., and they will be of a higher standard than heretofore reached; but they will be the outcome of natural growth and not of forced, artificial methods.

"Love's Awakening," the negative of which I saw run off at the Essanay plant the other day, is one of those wholesome, interesting, good average comedies that always pleases an audience. No claim can be made that the story is unusual or sensational, or original—no more than one can claim originality in love-making. But the love story that grips the hearts of young and old is there, and it is worked out in a way that makes the pulse beat faster and the eye moisten with a feeling of happiness.

I would draw the attention of critical picture lovers to the excellent acting shown in this film. One sees so much of the nervous, jerky, self-conscious type of acting in pictures that it is a positive godsend to view men and women portrayed in pictures as men and women, and not as marionettes. Producer Webster is to be congratulated for thus bringing into service the wide and varied knowledge possessed by him of stage craft.

There is another feature of this film that deserves mention and commendation, and that is, the fine photography. Rural scenes abound in the production, and it will be seen that the smallest details are well brought out and that the light and shade effects are artistically preserved. On inquiring about this feature, I learned that the marked improvement is due to more careful camera work and to a more skilful handling of the film in the developing room.

The main scenes of the story are laid in the country, although we also catch glimpses of the big, busy city. The opening scene shows the return of a haying party to the barnyard. On the high-piled load of hay we see a bevy of pretty, laughing, country girls. As they slide down its slanting sides, they are caught and kissed by the boys and some of them are pursued by the ardent swains, as they scamper out of the camera's field.

Jewel Graham is the last to descend and, as she alights, she is joined by a young farmer, David Allen, who shows her marked attention. While engaged in avowing his love to the girl, David is interrupted by the appearance of Jim Long, a clerk in the country drug store. Jim throws one of his pleasant smiles in Jewel's direction as he passes, which plays havoc with Dave's love-making, for the girl soon bids him good evening and passes out of view in the direction taken by Jim.

Next we have a view of the interior of the country drug store with Jim behind the counter attending to the wants of customers, and particularly to Jewel. Then we catch sight of the lovers on a country road, Jim carrying her school books as they walk towards her home. The gate is reached and the old story is told there, after which we see Jim asking Jewel's father for her hand. The elder man gently refuses at the time, reminding Jim that he must first show that he can support a wife.

To prove his mettle Jim departs for the city to make his fortune, and we next see him installed as clerk in one of the large, metropolitan, retail drug establishments. There he is impressed by the smart dresses worn by the young lady customers, and his head is turned by their easy manners and glib tongue. One of these city belles selects Jim as her beau, to change the routine of her city conquests; and he, fearing to become guilty of disloyalty to Jewel, writes the latter that he cannot live without her and asking her to meet him at the old station, at 10 o'clock on a certain night.

Jewel at first puts away from her the thought of elopement; but, in the end, her love for Jim prevails and she steals out to meet him at the appointed hour. Meanwhile Jim has acquainted the city girl with his secret and she persuades him to send a telegram to Jewel stating that he cannot come, because he loves another. This telegram is handed to Jewel by the stationmaster, just as the night train, that was to have brought her lover, pulls out. Mentally prostrated she turns homewards, and on the way falls helpless, and is rescued by Dave Allen.

Jewel informs Dave of the baseness of her former lover, and he again presses his suit but receives only pledges of friendship. Soon afterwards, she receives a letter from Jim begging forgiveness and revealing that his city inamorata had jilted him. Her woman's true nature aroused and quickened, Jewel sees the wide gap between the characters of David and Jim, and the slow thinking, brawny young farmer appears to her, as never before, in his true light, both as constant lover and loyal protector.

The last scene shows how David came into his own, while the father of his promised bride smiles with pleased countenance on his daughter's choice.

The date of the release of "Love's Awakening" will be announced later on.

SCENES FROM THE ESSANAY COMEDY DRAMA, "LOVE'S AWAKENING."

GOOD PICTURES IN OGDEN THEATRE.

The reputation earned by the motion picture theatres in Ogden, Utah, for having first class, up-to-date entertainments is surely sustained this week in the high class pictures running in each of the four houses.

Only the best the motion picture camera can produce is shown in the houses and among the pictures this week are two excellent Biographs, "The Banker's Daughter," and "The Message of the Violin." Biograph productions are too well known to the Ogden picture public for any comment to be made—the name Biograph is sufficient.

The Vitagraph are fast making a reputation for their fine photography and high class productions. Three of their pictures are in the local houses this week "The Bachelor and the Baby," a very pretty society drama, full of complications; "Ransomed, or a Prisoner of War," a war drama of 1863, an immense story of a child's love for his father, southern life and characteristic features of the people south of the Mason-Dixon line; "Brother Man," a dramatic play in which two men of opposite environments recognized and appreciate the good qualities of each other, and extend the hand of fellowship in the establishment of the brotherhood and betterment of mankind.

The comic pictures are very good all through, but one that is especially good, "A Wedding Trip from Montreal, Canada, to Hong Kong," is both scenic and comic, and is one of Edison's best.

The music is all new and the songs are very good. The bill in any of the houses will insure an hour of pleasure to lovers of photoplays.

PENN. R. R. Y. M. C. A. ENTERTAINS.

The members of Pennsylvania R. R. Young Men's Christian Association, of the Harrisburg branch, Harrisburg, Pa., entertained a large number of friends to a photoplay entertainment, in their rooms last Tuesday and Wednesday evenings. The pictures were of the latest industrial, educational, historical and comedy films.

The proceeds of the entertainment will go to Brotherhood of R. R. Trainmen. The railroaders were especially much pleased with the railroad pictures.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyright by J. H. Hallberg. All Rights Reserved.

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 12.—All modern transformers are made with two primary and two secondary coils, the terminals of all coils being so arranged that the primary and secondary may be connected for either series or parallel operation, which permits the same transformer to operate on two different voltages on both primary and secondary for either two-wire or three-wire system. When the three-wire system of electric distribution is employed great care should be exercised in balancing the load properly between the neutral and the outside wires so that the unbalancing of the voltage and consequent change in candle-power of the electric lamps will be reduced to a minimum.

"ELECTRICAL TALK" No. 13

Electrical Service.

In our previous "Electrical Talk" careful discussion has been given to the fundamental rules of governing the generating and distributing of electricity. I have purposely avoided to refer in particular or detail to the electric installation on the premises of the consumer of the electric current, limiting all previous discussions to general information on how the electric light company generates and distributes electricity to be used by the consumer.

Figure 29 is a plain view of a street showing part of a few regular building blocks. You will observe that the stores along the street are of different sizes, requiring a greater or less number of lamps, and the electric lighting company have located their poles and wires on one side of the street. The section is intended to illustrate one or two business blocks where considerable electric current would be required. For the sake of simplicity I omit showing the high voltage wires, illustrating only the secondary wires from the transformer or the low tension wires of a regular two-wire or three-wire direct-current system. In the illustration the transformer mounted on top of one of the poles receives current from the high voltage system over two small wires, and this transformer feeds a two-wire or three-wire main running along the street as illustrated. Suppose the electric light company gets a customer for store A anl they require only eight or ten incandescent 16-candle-power lamps, which would require approximately 5 amperes at 110 volts. In this case it would not be necessary to bring all three wires into the building, so only two wires are brought in: namely, one of the outside and a "neutral" wire, as illustrated. This will serve the customer with 110 volt current.

Suppose a customer at E is running a factory where he wants a large electric motor installed, but he does not require any light, then the electric company would furnish him with current at 220 volts, in which case they would bring in the two outside wires of the system as illustrated. Suppose the theatre in the center of the block wants current for incandescent lighting, ventilating, spot lights and motion pictures and stereopticon lights. In this case the electric company would bring in all of the wires, giving to the theatre the regular three-wire system, which delivers 110 volts on each side of the "neutral" and 220 volts between the outside wires.

A new customer wants current at H for about 10 incandescent lamps, then the electric company will run across the street with only two wires, giving 110 volts.

If you closely study Figure 29 you will find that this three-wire system is balanced because there are 10 lamps in store A at one side of the three-wire system which are balanced against 10 lamps in store H on the opposite side of the system. The motor is on the two outside wires getting 220 volts in factory E, which, of course, does not unbalance the system and the theatre having all three wires brought in will give a balanced load to the system, providing the wiring and the arrangement of the lamps, motors, etc., is properly attended to by a competent electrical man.

Suppose a motion picture theatre starting at J requires electrical service for a M. P. lamp and a few incandescent lamps and that the building J has been wired for two-wire system, the electrical company will be compelled to run only two wires to the building unless it is rewired and the choice is one of the outside wires and the "neutral," in which case 110 volts is supplied, or the two outside wires which would deliver 220 volts. The M. P. man's machine, motors and fitting happen to be made for 110 volts there is only one choice and that is, the 110-volt service.

Suppose the system is alternating and the rheostat is used, then for a good light two rheostats must be used in parallel or multiple, and the M. P. lamp would draw around 60 to 70 amperes the instant the carbon points are put together and would normally require around 45 amperes. You can imagine how the previously balanced three-wire system referred to and illustrated in Figure 29 would be disturbed every time the M. P. at J is switched on and put in operation or when it is cut off.

The result in practice would usually be that all customers connected on the same side of the three-wire system as J would notice a considerable drop in the candle-power of their lamps as would be the case in store H, and there would be a drop in candle-power of all lamps connected to the left-hand 110-volt circuit brought into the theatre on the opposite side of the street. On the other hand, the lamps in Store A would burn brighter as would also the lamps connected to the right-hand side of the electric service for the theatre.

This unbalancing has already been referred to in previous "electrcal talks," but I want you to keep in mind the serious inconvenience and disturbance to an electric system which has been subjected to unbalancing of the load. To operators of motion picture machines this point is of particular importance, because if the voltage drops below normal, the operator cannot produce results, and just because you always had good current that is no reason why tomorrow the condtion may not be changed, possibly due to one of your neighbors putting in a motor or additional lamps and these may be connected to the same side of the system to which your M. P. lamp is connected, forcing the voltage below normal.

I know of some instances where electric service has been run into a theatre and everything appeared to be satisfactory for a long time. All of a sudden the M. P. lamp would not work properly, nor would the outside arc lights, and the manager observes a considerable dip in the candle-power of his incandescent lamps every time the M. P. lamp was switched on. Upon investigation it was found that the electric lighting company's linemen had connected another customer to the same wires and transformer which supplied the M. P. theatre, overloading the wires and the transformer, and the most natural thing in the world followed; namely, a big drop in voltage and consequently in the light, as less amperes can be put through the lamps with the lower voltage. Dissatisfaction follows, and the operator gets unjustly blamed, in many instances, for troubles caused by interference in the electric system beyond his control. It really takes a volt meter to tell whether the voltage is right or wrong and to what extent the voltage may drop, but an expert can also judge approximately the voltage drop by the dip in the candle-power of incandescent lamps connected to the system.

The foregoing discusses the first part of the electric service for buildings.

Summary.

With a given system of electric mains running in front of a number of buildngs, whether two-wire or three-wire system, perfect results can be had if the voltage supplied to the mains is constant, the mains are of proper size, the transformer of proper size, and the load properly balanced between the "neutral" and each outside wire.

With a system as that described above, great troubles may be experienced if the voltage varies, if the wires are too small, if the transformer is too small, or does not regulate well, and if additional load is added without consideration being given to the proper balancing of the load and the necessary increase in size of transformer, mains, service wires, electric meter, switches and fuses.

In our next "Electrical Talk" we will further discuss the electric service.

BAD LENS.

New York writes: My picture is out of focus in the center. Have put new aperture plate and new tension springs on but with no good results. What do you think can be the trouble?

Answer—Have you looked at your lens? It is possible that you have some oil or a finger-print on it and if so that would blur your picture in the center. Try another lens and, if you get the same results, look at your tension springs. They may be set too far in or out, not bearing squarely on the aperture plate tracks, causing the film to buckle in or out as it passes the aperture and in that way your picture would be out of focus in the center.

CONDENSERS.

I am projecting about a 17 ft. stereo. picture at 75 ft. and the corners do not come out clear, they are all yellow. Have my lamp (arc) as close to the condensers as I can and that does not do any good. Have brought the lamp (arc) back as far as I can and still no results. Are condensers made of different focal lengths?

Answer—You do not mention what size condensers you are using, but from your letter I should say you are using two 6½ condensers and, if such is the case, you cannot get the yellow corners out at that throw and with that size picture and the style of lamp you are using. What you want is two 7½ or two 8-inch condensers. Try the 7½-in. condensers and if that does not take the yellow out of the corners (I am of the opinion that it will), then try the 8-in. condensers and I am sure you will have better results. Condensers are made in different focal lengths, 6½, 7½, 8 and 8½ and several other focal lengths but the condensers mostly used for Moving Picture work is 6½ and 7½, these are considered the standard condensers.

LENSES.

Brooklyn writes: How many times does the light cross itself after leaving the arc until it reaches the screen? Where does the picture right itself? At what point does the light cross itself?

Answer—The light rays cross themselves once between the arc and the screen at a point half way between the two lenses that go to make up the projection lens. At that point the rays all meet in a point and it is at that point also that the picture rights itself, that is to say comes right side up. If you will follow the diagram given below you will see what I mean.

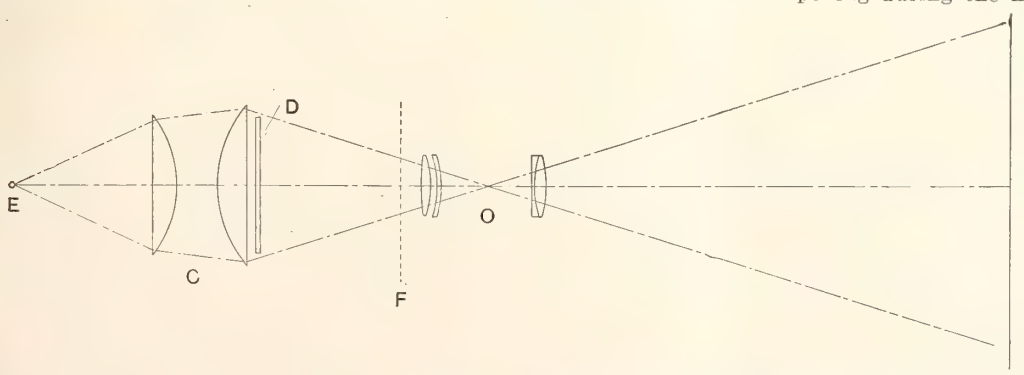

Diagram of Projection—E. Lamp; C. Condensing Lenses; D. Lantern Slide; S. Screen; O. Projection Lenses.

FILM BUCKLING.

Milwaukee, Wis., writes he is having trouble with the film buckling in the center. Says he has put on a new aperture plate, new tension springs, new gate, new idlers, and in fact, have had the machine overhauled by a Moving Picture Machinist.

Answer—I am at a loss to see how you can have so much trouble with your film buckling up, but it is possible that your film tension springs are set too far on one or both sides; that is, one or both of them are set over too far towards the picture opening so they are partly off the tracks of the aperture plate and causing the film to buckle slightly as it passes under them. It is also possible that your tension springs are set too far in the opposite direction, thus causing your film to bulge out instead of in. If you find that this does not answer then try the aperture plate to see if it is true (in line), with sprocket. It is possible you have one side screwed tighter than the other and, in that way, it would have a tendency to make your film buckle up as the aperture plate would not be true. Would like to hear as to what success you have.

SIZE OF PICTURE WANTED.

Astoria, L. I., writes: What size picture would be advisable for a small house with a 44 ft. throw? Also, does large or small pictures have any effect on the picture flickering?

Answer—Regarding the size of picture, I would like to know the size of your screen. However, from the distance you have given I imagine you have a screen about 12x16, and if so, a picture to fill that size screen would be about the proper size. You could have it smaller, but I think a picture 12x16 would appear more lifelike than any other size picture projected. The size of the picture makes no material difference in regard to flicker. I would suggest putting your screen back about six feet from the first row of seats in your auditorium, as the effect is better to those sitting so close to the screen as well as to those sitting in other parts of the house.

Lynn, Mass., writes: What would be the trouble with a machine which shows white streaks shooting up and down when letters in printed matter appears on the title; also when titles are shown? We have tried to set the shutter but for some reason or other we cannot seem to get it so that it makes a good picture.

Answer—Take the wide wing of the shutter and have it cover the opening during the movement of the intermittent sprocket and you will find that this will eliminate the "travel ghost." If this does not remedy it your shutter then is evidently too narrow. You should have a new shutter put on. It is possible to rivet a small piece of metal on to the side of the shutter, but this is not advisable for the reason that a new shutter can be had very quickly from a nearby town. I am quite sure, however, that if you follow these instructions you will overcome all your difficulties. When you are experimenting with the shutter if you should find that at one point the streaks shoot up, then move your shutter down, if, on the other hand, the streaks are down, then move it up a little; but if they shoot up and down at the same time then what you need is a new shutter. Your shutter is then too narrow which causes the white streaks or "travel ghosts."

CARBONS AND SHUTTER.

Piedmont, W. Va., writes: Why do they use a perforated shutter on the Edison Machine? Should the carbons be in a straight line or should the lower one extend out a little? I am using A. C. current. What causes the carbons to splutter. Is it because the carbons are poor?

Answer—(1) The reason the wing on the shutter of an Edison machine is perforated is that it decreases the flicker or makes it much less noticeable by perforating the wing of the shutter so that some light will pass through it, thus producing a sort of a grey instead of a black curtain, as this wing passes in front of the light. Without this wing you would find that while your picture would be much more brilliant there would be such a flicker the pictures would be ruined.

(2) The lower carbon should not be extended, it should be in line with the upper carbon on alternating current. On direct current the lower carbon should be extended a little in advance of the upper carbon so as to form the crater properly. It may be that you have a bad lot of carbons. Bad core in carbons would make them splutter. Try carbons that are perfect and I am sure you will have no more trouble.

Marion, O. writes: What focal lens should be used for a 90 ft. throw?

Answer—It depends somewhat on the size picture as well as throw. There is a distinct relation between the focal length of condensers and projecting lenses. The smaller your picture the longer your focal length with your projection lens will be for a given throw. I should say two 7½ condensers will answer for throw given by you; namely, 90 ft. When asking questions always give size of picture wanted at a given throw.

CALCIUM LIGHT.

Cranford, N. J., writes, asking how to use Calcium Light and how to get the best results.

Answer—Fit the lime in the lime cup taking care that it is in an upright position. Have washers in the couplings before connecting cylinders. First turn on the Hydrogen Gas (black cylinder), until you obtain a flame as large as from a good sized gas burner, then turn the Oxygen (red cylinder), until you get the light required. Turn the lime about a quarter of a turn every ten minutes. Too much Oxygen dulls the light; little red point flames should always be around the lime. If the light should snap out, shut off both cylinders, disconnect the hose, blow through it, connect again, then commence the same as beginning, but use a little more Hydrogen. In shutting off the light, turn off the Oxygen Gas first. When through see that valves on cylinders are shut tight.

THE SHUTTER.

St. John, Mich., writes, asking what principle is involved in the shutter of a Moving Picture Machine, that is—what is the action of the shutter in relation to the movement of the film?

Answer—It is very simple; the shutter must cover the aperture, or very nearly cover it, during the entire time the intermittent is in action and no longer. That is all there is to the action of the shutter.

Wilkes-Barre, Pa., writes: Will you tell me what is the trouble with my picture? It is out of focus about three feet on one side of the screen. How can I remedy this? When I focus this part of the picture the rest of the picture is out of focus and vice versa. Have tried several lenses of different makes and each and every one of them give me the same results.

Answer—You do not say where you are projecting the picture from, but I am of the opinion that you are working from one side of the house instead of in the center of the house where the machine belongs. If such is the case the only way your picture could be out so much on one side—taking for granted what you say is correct—that you have used different makes of lenses, but have been unable to get better results—is because your screen is not set right. I would advise you to bring your screen out about three feet on the side farthest from you and in that way your screen will be on the same angle as your machine. It is also possible that your light is not in focus with the center of your projecting lens, this would have a tendency to blur your picture on one side but not so much as three feet, so I think that the former answer is correct.

PICTURE HOUSE NOT SO BAD.

Manager Says It Should Not be Singled Out for Attack In Vice Crusade.

Yankton, S. D., Nov. 8, 1910.

The Film Index:

Gentlemen—There has been lots of writing done along the line of the "Photoplay a Den of Vice," etc. As long as there are churches, schools, theatres, or any places of entertainment or religious meeting, vice will creep in. But why lay it all at the door of the photoplay. True it is that these places of amusement are at present the best patronized of anything along the line of entertainment or religion. I have been running a photoplay theatre for ten months and have been unable to see any harm in it. Children of all ages come with and without parents, and they are all well behaved.

We have some men come in who are under the influence of liquor, but I would rather they visited the photoplay than go back to the saloon. As long as they behave themselves I let them alone, and will say that those I thought best to put out I have done so with no disturbance. I find that kindness is best in all cases.

Miss Richardson, who has busied herself in looking up the ill effects of the photoplay, should not confine herself to these houses of amusement. She could study the ill effects of the Salvation Army or the Christian Endeavor Society. Now these two societies, I believe, do more good than any other two organizations that I can think of, but wherever there is a crowd of people together vice will be found if you look for it.

I have never studied along these lines as Miss Richardson has. The churches are "well lighted," but still sin is there. We would not dare say that the churches are harmful, or that Salvation Armies should stop work. They are both splendid organizations for the betterment of mankind, and I believe, too, that the photoplay is now filling a long felt want. The rich have all sorts of amusements and now the poor can have theirs. Why fight it all the time? Perhaps there are some wrong things done in the picture houses; so there are at the post office and the street corners. Those are places where couples meet, but we cannot banish them.

I burn sixteen 16-c.p. lamps inside of Japanese lanterns in my auditorium. The light is sufficient to read newspaper print readily, and it has no bad effect on the curtain. I have both a white and metallic curtain, but prefer the white, as I believe the other will hurt the eyes in a short time. It does give a better picture, but you can just as easily have a light theatre and a white curtain.

Make the theatres "light up;" the public like it better and will come oftener. Very truly,

E. M. VALENTINE.

PLAYING THE PICTURES

By Clyde Martin

IN this stage of the game, you can scarcely pick up a trade paper that you do not see some suggestion or tip from an exhibitor giving his means of pulling off novelty stunts and drawing business to his picture house. If you talk to different exhibitors over the country it is the same thing, they are always ready to tell you how they "packed them in" during their voting contest or amateur nights, or, they may give you the address of some junk wholesale house where you can buy "handsome" souvenirs for half a cent apiece, and how much money they took in while they were giving away the souvenirs. The main idea with the average exhibitor is get them in the theatre, if they come once, you have ten cents of their money, then the next time you give something away, you may get another dime.

The exhibitor seems to make no distinction between "the people" and "patrons," yet there is a vast difference. Patrons are the people that have come to your theatre and enjoyed the music and pictures to such an extent that they come back to see your next change of program. This may sound silly to you but the point I am driving at is, the people that come to your theatre on the strength of voting for their neighbor's little girl, or the people that come after a souvenir cup and saucer, are not the ones that get you the money, you may pack the house on these nights and possibly draw a little business away from your competitor for a couple of nights, but, is this kind of business really getting you the money? Wouldn't it pay you better to put on a good show and make picture fans out of them, so they will come every change of program instead of just getting them whenever you give something away?

If you have the souvenir craze in your noodle, you had better put store pictures in your building instead of a picture machine. If you are running a picture house give them a good grade of pictures with appropriate music, and see which pays best.

In the trade papers you can see article after article encouraging better music, music that fits the pictures, yet, it seems that the exhibitor cannot see the idea. I have tried time and time again to figure it out, and I certainly wish some one would enlighten me on the question.

If the exhibitor will cater to a family business and deliver the goods he will never be obliged to resort to such unprofessional methods as voting contests, souvenirs, amateur nights, etc. You can flood the town with hand bills and fill the house, but, you cannot expect them to come back unless you give them a good show.

I have tried to encourage better music in picture houses, and I have found several level minded exhibitors who have bettered their show by putting in musicians that have some regard for the picture on the screen, and if you will notice, the exhibitor who is looking after the music is the one that is getting the business.

I have visited some houses where they have had excellent music for the pictures and still the musicians have been handicapped, I cannot say whether it has been the fault of the operator or the manager, but no matter who was to blame, the pictures were run through the machine like a Kansas cyclone, making the efforts of the musicians in vain.

Sometimes the operator is to blame for running pictures too fast but, if you sift it down you will generally find the manager has instructed the operator to "shoot the show." The reason I say it is nearly always the manager's fault, is because you will notice these conditions on the big nights when there is a crowd in the lobby waiting for the next show.

When a manager, for the sake of saving a few minutes' time, will push the show, he has no use for a piano player that plays the pictures what he wants is an electric piano.

We will take for example such a picture as the Vitagraph release of September 30, "A Home Melody," a picture where a good musician could make the subjects talk, and then to have the manager instruct the operator to hurry the pictures along, for the sake of a few more nickels and dimes, is enough to discourage everyone interested in the advancement of the picture industry.

Another drawback in the musician's work is poorly selected programs. You may have a good piano player, one that can follow the pictures and then not give him any chance to work. By this I mean, if you are running a three-reel show and your program is made up of three reels of comedy, your piano player is obliged to play the same class of music through the entire show and the music as well as the pictures becomes very monotonous, the same may be said of a program made up of all dramatic or all western pictures.

It is very encouraging to note that the film exchanges are trying to overcome this point, by engaging program clerks that try to give the exhibitor a variety of pictures.

At Dodges theatre, Keokuk, Iowa, where I am working at present, our programs usually run the same. We try to open with a short scenic film followed by a comedy, then an Indian or a western picture and close with the feature dramatic. It has always been customary with most exhibitors to close their show with comedy, but I have found, if you have a musician that can bring the life out of a strong dramatic subject, it will leave a better impression in the minds of your patrons to close with a dramatic picture instead of a comedy.

From time to time the piano players over the country receive circulars, and read advertisements in the trade papers of different music publishers that are putting motion picture music on the market in book form, and I believe if these folios are handled properly they will be a big help to musicians. By being handled properly I mean, if the piano player will take one of these books and memorize such parts as the Indian war dances and the most important features, it will be a big help to him, but you must memorize so that you will not be obliged to refer to music during the showing of the pictures.

In playing Indian pictures, never let the drummer use a tom tom except during a war dance. Some musicians are under the impression that the tom tom should be used through every Indian picture from start to finish, but this is a great mistake, the tom tom should be used for a war dance only. Another great mistake that is made by many that do not look after the little details, is the use of horse hoof imitations. Some drummers use horse hoof imitations whenever a horse is shown on the screen regardless of whether the horse is running on the grass, crossing a creek or running on a pavement. There may be many in the audience that never notice these things, at the same time there are so many that do notice details, and it is just as easy to do things right as wrong that it would be well to watch all of these points.

Another point that is being sadly neglected by some trap drummers, is the telephone. It is a very easy matter for a drummer to have an electric bell in his line of traps, and I have found if they will have the push button on the floor it is a very easy matter to catch telephone cues without interfering with the other work.

Take such pictures as "Two Little Waifs" or "Waiter No. 5" the telephone effect will make a good point for you, and everyone in the audience will appreciate the fact that you are working with the pictures.

DIXIE THEATRE HAS NEW MANAGER.

Mr. A. Korumann, the popular manager of the Dixie Theatre, Houston, Tex., left for the company's headquarters at Little Rock, Nov. 1, where he takes charge of a vaudeville and motion picture company to make a two months' tour through the big cities of the East and West. Mr. Korumann being an old vaudeville man of many years' experience, his friends can only predict a success for the company. After this tour is over he will return to Little Rock.

Mr. W. H. Hulsey, the new manager, has arrived and will take charge of the Dixie on December 1st, and in his genial way wants to assure the public that he will extend the same cordial treatment to the patrons of this little theatre as his predecessor, Mr. A. Korumann.

PALS

A Drama of the Gold Field, Produced by G. Melies

IN the days shortly after the Mexican War, gold was discovered in California, and the young men of our country rushed there in great numbers, many to be made millionaires, while others failed or met foul play at the hands of the Mexican Greasers, who still inhabited that territory.

Denton, a young Easterner, is one of the many who went to California to make or break his fortune. He arrived in a small mining town alone and poor, save in courage and hope. He went about the taverns and the public places for a partner, but there lurked a mistrust in the breasts of those inhabitants against Easterners, so that Denton almost despaired of success. He is present, however, in one of the miners' saloons when a brawl takes place between a Westerner and a Mexican Greaser, during which the Mexican turns treacherous and attempts to stab his adversary when the latter was not looking. At this moment Denton rushes forward and foils the greaser, therefore winning the gratitude of the Westerner and gaining him as a partner.

The two commence operations in a mine and it is not long before things are running smoothly and they are making money. One day the Westerner falls and breaks his leg, and during a long period of illness his partner, Denton, nurses him faithfully, winning more and more his trust and gratitude.

After three years the partners are rich—on Easy street. They have many bags of gold dust between them, and are now big figures in the mining field. The Westerner leaves their hut one morning, when espied by the Mexican greaser who had once played him foul, and who was now looking for another opportunity to show his wrath. He steals to the hut and through the windows—watches the movements of Denton, and learns where the gold is kept.

Denton receives a telegram from home stating that his mother is on her death-bed. He immediately writes a note to his partner explaining matters and hurriedly leaves the camp for home. Meanwhile the greaser substitutes a note of his own for that Denton had left, in which he forges Denton to say: "I am tired of western life and as I have done most of the work will take all of the gold."

The partner arriving home is sick and disgusted through and through that after having placed all confidence in Denton, to have him turn out after all, dishonest as was his opinion of Easterners always. He follows Denton to the city, where he attempts to locate him, and it is only through the existence of Denton's daughter that he succeeds. The little girl is hurt by an automobile, and the Westerner comes quickly to her aid, not dreaming that she is his former partner's daughter. He carries her home, where he comes face to face with Denton, and there is a dramatic scene between the old pals, now estranged.

In the midst of their excitement a telegram arrives from the gold field announcing that the Mexican greaser, on his death-bed, has confessed his trickery. There is great joy in the Denton household. The partners are reunited and a stronger bond than ever is born.

NEW HOUSE FOR SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

Another new photoplay theatre is to be opened on Main street, Springfield, Mass., within the next two weeks. The permit was issued last week by Commissioner F. W. Lumis to contractors to make alterations in the building formally occupied by the Wellman store. The cost of the alterations will be over $5,000, and when the building is completed it will be one of the coziest little photoplay houses in the city. Only pictures and illustrated songs will comprise the entertainment.

WANT TO EXAMINE ALL PICTURES

Ontario Lawmakers Claim Pictures Are Not Up to Moral Standard—Expect Government Will Censor All Films

The censorship of motion picture productions throughout Ontario by duly constituted official authority is, the Spectator understands, under governmental consideration, and it seems probable that steps will be taken to ensure the elimination of all views calculated to have an unwholesome influence upon the thousands of young people who frequent these centers of amusement. No official statement of its proposals has yet been made by the government, but it is understood that, following a conference with Sir James Whitney, Hon. A. J. Matheson, the provincial treasurer, has the matter under advisement.

It is believed that the plan which the minister has in contemplation will be for the appointment of a board probably composed of three members who will be required to pass favorably on all films submitted before a provincial license is granted for their production. The action taken will, according to the Spectator's information, be at the initiative of the government.

The attention of the premier has been directed to the immense patronage which is falling to the lot of these cheap forms of entertainment, particularly among young people and children, and the necessity accordingly of making compulsory some satisfactory standard of production is said to have impressed itself upon him. Investigation has shown that scores of these moving picture theatres now operating in all the cities and larger towns, as well as many located in rural communities, are more or less careless as to the influence of their productions on their impressionable audiences. In frequent cases, it is said that the equipment brought from the United States comprises scenes by no means calculated to develop the best in those who see them, and in some cases, it is alleged that their influence is harmful.

Legislation was introduced by Hon. Col. Matheson two years ago, under which motion picture shows in Ontario were placed under license, and regulations ensuring their safety from fire were adopted. It is probable that the provinial government will, in the near future, go a step further and appoint an official board, whose duty it will be to examine all films before they are exhibited in Ontario, with a view to censoring such representations as may be deemed deleterious to youthful minds. The pictures to be expunged are not only those of a suggestive or immoral character, but those dealing with crime, gambling, drinking scenes, or calculated to make light of the sanctity of marriage.

BELVIDERE OPERA HOUSE LEASED.

The Belvidere Opera House, Belvidere, N. Y., has been leased to well known theatrical parties from Unadilla, N. Y., who will turn the place into a photoplay theatre in the near future. It is said that the parties who leased the opera house, have a chain of photoplay theatres in that section of the state and intend adding the Belvidere house as another link.

The house is plenty large enough to accommodate traveling companies, but the experiment has not been a paying proposition and for that reason the house will run pictures only. The location of the house is the best in the town and should draw largely from the outlying districts.

KALEM CO.

"THE LAD FROM OLD IRELAND."—Kalem's much talked of real Irish production is announced for Wednesday, Nov. 23. In line with the enterprise which has of late been displayed by all of the licensed manufacturers, Kalem Co. in a strong effort after realism sent a stock company during the past Summer to Ireland, there to make amid actual Irish surroundings some scenes for a production which had been commenced at their New York studio and in characteristic scenes in New York City itself. Ordinarily photographic work in Ireland is entirely interrupted or greately impeded by weather conditions, but the Kalem Co. happened to be very fortunate in this respect, and the scenes which were made in Ireland are positively brilliant in photography. The Kalem producers were helped out greatly by prominent Irishmen of New York City, who gave them letters of introduction to Richard Croker, John Redmond and other notable Irishmen on the old sod, and as a result "The Lad from Old Ireland" is a picture which will appeal to the patriotism and enthusiasm of every true Irishman. The story is very simple and direct, merely that of a young Irish lad who leaves the old country to seek his fortune in the new. His little sweetheart he leaves behind in care of her old granny, promising to return to her later on. We are given all the details of the young Irishman's trip abroad, including scenes in mid ocean int he steerage of the Baltic; his arrival at Castle Garden and then some bits of his career in New York, concluding with his successful entrance into politics and his election as a Tammany alderman. Of course it would not be a real Irish drama if the young hero did not go back to Ireland just in time to save his colleen from eviction, but the realism of the real Irish scenes makes this feature of the story remarkably convincing, and when at the conclusion of the film the Irish flag is seen unfolding and fluttering from a staff it will be hard to control the emotions of the average motion picture audience, comprising as it does so many true Irishmen and women.

It will be of interest to admirers of Kalem films that the leading female role in "The Lad from Old Ireland" is played by Miss Gene Gauntier, of "Girl Spy" fame, while the title role is taken by Mr. Sidney Olcott, director of the Kalem producing forces.

"THE ROSES OF THE VIRGIN."—In "The Roses of the Virgin" the Kalem Co. offers a Western drama of a very unusual character which is distinctly religious and sentimental. The story is as follows: James Norwood, a wealthy lumber merchant, sends his dissolute son Jack to a lumber camp to give him a last chance to make good. The young man's habits of life, however, are so fixed that he soon forgets his good intentions and attempts to exercise his wiles on Marie, the pretty daughter of the camp foreman, although he is already a married man. Marie had previously promised her troth to Pierre Lolliard, a young lumberman long in her father's employ, but under the glamor of Jack Norwood's city ways she forgets her rustic lover and was about to elope with him when the plan was frustrated through the agency of a bunch of flowers. Pierre's mother had taken the last roses from her garden to adorn a wayside shrine of the Virgin. Marie asked Pierre to get her some flowers, intending to wear them at her wedding. Pierre, in the innocence of the intended use of the flowers, steals them from the shrine, but as if by a miracle the roses are the cause of a revelation of the true character of Jack Norwood, and the elopement is stopped just in time, and as a reverent and fitting climax to the play, Marie and Pierre take the roses and again lay them at the feet of the Virgin whence they were originally taken.

The leading part of this production is taken by Miss Alice Joyce, the new member of the Kalem Stock Co., whose work has been so favorably received of late.

LUBIN MFG. CO.

"CAUGHT BY THE CAMERA."—Howard West, a young dental graduate, settles in a western town. Being a camera enthusiast he soon makes the acquaintance of Nina Sanford, daughter of a rich rancher, and her chum, Dolores Mendez, whose brother is employed on Sanford's ranch. Both girls are active picture makers and the trio make many trips into the surrounding country for the purpose of making snap shots. West falls in love with Nina, who reciprocates his affection, and Dolores, as well, has given her heart to the good-looking dentist, though she conceals her passion, knowing West's love for Nina. Mendez also loves Nina and is discharged from Sanford's employ for kissing her as he lifts her from her horse. West gets a new camera with an extension exposure tube that permits him to form one of the number of the group he is taking. He takes the camera out to the ranch to show the girls. Mendez poisons Sanford's mind against West and the ranchman bursts upon the group as West is about to expose a plate. Ordering the girls to the house he charges West with betraying Nina's affections. West denies the charge with heat and in his anger leaves the ranch, forgetting his camera and his riding whip. The charge is so monstrous that he cannot face Nina in explanation, but rides off without speaking. Meantime, Mendez secures a double revenge by striking down the ranchman with West's loaded quirt. As the blow is struck he steps upon the exposure bulb of the camera and unwittingly records his crime. For the moment fate seems to be in his favor for the quirt, in connection with the facts of West's departure, seems sufficient evidence and West is apprehended and lodged in jail. Dolores has rescued the camera and is curious to see what the plate shows. She goes into her dark room and presently the damning evidence of her brother's crime flashes upon the surface of the plate. Should she shield her brother the man she loves must die for his crime, but she cannot denounce her own flesh and blood. She compromises with her conscience by first warning her brother and then riding to the District Attorney to submit her evidence. The legal forms are quickly complied with and West is free to marry Nina and Dolores in her unselfish love finds comfort in the thought that she has saved her hero, even while she knew that he would wed another.

"ROMANCE ON THE LAZY K."—Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy takes her niece, Alice Langdon, to the Lazy K ranch to recuperate from the effect of an arduous social campaign following the announcement of the engagement of Alice to a distant cousin, Rex Leachwood, who is another protege of the rich and autocratic old lady. Rex is left behind to enjoy the roof-garden performances and the comforts of his club, which is much more to his taste than roughing it on a ranch with a girl who he is marrying only because his Aunt insists and wields the ever effective club of disinheritance. But soon there comes a hurry call from the ranch. Alice has taken more than a decided liking to Donald Barton, who returns her interest compounded. Until Alice came, Don was entirely content to be engaged to Bessie Bowman, daughter of the owner of Lazy K, and pretty Bessie joins forces with Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy to win her sweetheart back. Rex answers the summons promptly, as is wise in an heir presumptive, but he finds Bessie decidedly interesting and proposes that they start a mild flirtation and by rousing Don's jealousy win him back for her. In hundreds of romances the scheme has worked most successfully, but this time they who play with fire are burned and Rex and Bessie find themselves very much in love with each other. Rex, recklessly forgetful of the masterful Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy, urges Bessie to break her engagement to Don but she tearfully refuses, though she admits that she loves only Rex. Don, on his part, has been having no easy time of it, for Alice will not return to Rex the ring that marks her betrothal. It seeems to be up to somebody to do something, so Don and Rex get busy. Rex challenges Don to a duel and with saddened faces the rivals stalk past the girls and Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy. Don lets drop the challenge and Bessie finds it. Wild with terror she shows it to the others and they hurry after the combatants. Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy is not built on the lines of a cross-country runner, but she makes pretty good time though the two boys get a little tired of waiting before they hear the bulky lady crashing through the brush. As the trio come upon the field of combat the men are facing each other with upraised guns. Bessie runs to shield Rex and Alice hurries to Don. Mrs. Pemberton-Pomeroy throws up her hands in resignation over the first situation she ever lost control of and her anger is not greatly cooled by the fans contained in the trick pistols with which the mock duel was fought.

"THE COWBOYS AND THE BACHELOR GIRLS."—What is a bachelor girl? One who is very fond of the bachelors but doesn't want anybody to know it. These bachelor girls are no different from any others; They pretend they are and positively refuse to have anything to do with the men. Their club, for they have formed themselves into an organization, is impenetrable for the sterner sex. Nora, who is the President of the club, receives a letter announcing the death of her uncle in the West and that he has made her heir to his immense fortune, including a ranch at Grey Oaks.

Nora decides to go West and take charge of the ranch and run it herself a la suffragette fashion. She invites all the girls to go with her and they start for their new home. Arriving at Grey Oaks, they pay no attention to the cowboys who greet them at the station but go at once in the old stage-coach to the ranch. The cowboys follow, approach the ranch, offer their services and are rewarded by being driven from the premises.

The boys make up their minds to "get next" to the girls and devise a scheme. Two of the girls on their way to town are attacked by some of the cowboys and two of the bunch rescue the girls from the "desperados," the trick works and the two fellows gallantly escort the girls on their way. Two more of the girls go fishing, one of the boys fixes up like a bear, attacks the girls who are saved from "instant death" by the cowboys. The girls are deeply grateful and reward the boys by allowing them to escort them back to the ranch.

Nora is the only one left. She is indignant to think the girls have forgotten all the rules and by-laws of the club by paying attention to men. She starts on a wild ride to town, declaring she will have none of it. We watch her riding a rough and unfrequented road where we see a "Mexican greaser" lurking. He hears Nora approaching, jumps on his horse and rides to meet her. She eludes him but he follows as she urges her horse at a mad pace, he goads his animal in the chase until he comes alongside Nora and snatches her bodily from the saddle. She struggles, they both fall to the ground and she fights with the Mexican for her life.

The remaining one of the cowboys coming that way hears her screams and with a lash and a plunge he hurries to Nora's assistance. He flings the ruffian aside but before he can pull his gun the villain attacks him with a knife which the cowboy succeeds in wrenching from his hand. This places the greaser at his mercy which he shows by allowing him to escape without further ceremony.

It is right here where the leader of the bachelor girls denounces her allegiance to the club's principles and falls into the arms and gives her heart into the keeping of the leader of the cowboys who so valiantly saved her life.

The hero and Nora go to the ranch where they are met by the rest of the girls and boys with a laugh, a shout and a hurrah.

BIOGRAPH CO.

"THE SONG OF THE WILDWOOD FLUTE."—The Indian motion picture subject is always entertaining, and when it is done with as absolute authenticity of detail it becomes instructive as well. The Biograph has always endeavored to depict the redman as he really is, and not as cheap literature would portray him. Hence, it is that a motion picture of this work becomes more convincing than text books, histories or historical novels. In this subject are incorporated several traditional customs with as lifelike portrayal as is possible, engaging in the production the services of a number of the descendants of the aborigines. In the opening scene is shown the Corn Dance, which is a ceremonial performed in thanksgiving to the Great Master for his bountiful yield of crops. The dance is performed each year at the harvest. During the course of the dance, Dove Eyes, the pretty little squaw, becomes very much attracted by Gray Cloud, the brave who leads the dance. Gray Cloud is handsome and graceful, and it is small wonder that he should impress the pretty maid. Her interest in him does not go unnoticed for the brave has long been smitten with the little squaw and bashfully makes advances which are just as coyly received. To conclusively learn his fate, he goes to the old squaw to hire the love flute. This is the time-honored custom of lovers and is their form of wooing. This love flute is held in the custody of a spinster squaw and the swains hire it from her with the payment of skins to serenade the object of their affections. If the maid is enticed from the tepee by the strain of the flute, the lover is given hope. Dove Eyes appears and Gray Cloud wins his suit, and prepares for the marriage. Meanwhile, Gray Cloud's rival hires the flute to serenade Dove Eyes, but she turns a deaf ear, and so the rival goes away disgruntled and vowing vengeance. After the marriage Gray Cloud starts on a hunting trip. His rival follows at a distance determined to wreak revenge. Some distance away from the village the rival makes a move to shoot Gray Cloud, but desists, not having the cold blood to effect this purpose. He has hardly lowered the gun when he sees Gray Cloud disappear. The earth seems to have swallowed him, and it does in a measure, for when the rival runs to the spot, he finds Gray Cloud at the bottom of a bear pit. To get out unaided is impossible, but his rival merely laughs derisively and leaves him to his fate. The little squaw has been pining all this while for Gray Cloud, who has now been absent for several days. Dragging herself to her father's tepee, she is taken ill on the very threshold and is carried inside. The medicine man is called, and after many prayers and incantations gives the case up. The rival hears the cries of the poor heartcrushed little squaw and all the animosity he held for Gray Cloud dissipates, so he runs to the pit and drags Gray Cloud out, helping him to Dove Eyes' side, who livens up as he is the real doctor of her ills.

"HIS NEW LID."—The next time Jenks purchases a new hat he will have it screwed to his pate so that he and the lid will be absolutely inseparable, for his most recently procured Kelly cost him both money and trouble in abundance. On his way to his office one morning, he decides to get a new straw hat. With his head topped with this new crown he looks quite debonair. Lunch-time arriving, he goes to appease the cravings of his pneumogastric nerve, and here his trouble begins when an exchange of hats is made, someone taking his new sky-piece, leaving in its stead a woolly creation of masculine millinery, with a surface like a bath-mit. Towering with rage, he returns to his office, where he receives a telegram calling him out of town in a hurry on business. Despatching word to his wife he hustles off. Meanwhile, the purloiner of his lid, while walking along the seashore loses it overboard, and it is carried out to see to be driven back on the shore by the return tide, where it is picked up by a neighbor of Jenks, who, finding the name and address on the band, takes it to whom he now assumes to be Widow Jenks—a most natural conclusion. Instanter the mourning of the dear departed (?) is precipitated. Fancy his surprise and their amazement when he returns. It is with difficulty he persuades all hands that he is material and ethereal. The undertaker, however, is insistent and Jenks pays for a funeral he hadn't the chance of enjoying.

"NOT SO BAD AS IT SEEMED."—Appearances are deceiving and circumstantial evidence should be taken with caution. In this Biograph subject the circumstances were apparently very compromising. Mr. and Mrs. Jones are about to start on a hurried trip. Mrs. Jones writes a note to her friend and neighbor, Mrs. Young, asking her to feed the bird every day during her absence. Mr. Jones writes to his friend, Mr. Hall, bidding him to enjoy the use of his library during the while. Mrs. Young is possessed of a jealous dispositioned hubby, while Mr. Hall's wifey is endowed with the like sensitiveness. Mrs. Young and Mr. Hall go to Jones' domicile each with their own mission in view, and each unknown to the other. Mr. Hall is in the library, while Mrs. Young is in the sitting room, when Hall knocks over a piece of bric-a-brac, frightening the wits out of Mrs. Young, who starts in alarm. Each reckon the other a hidden burglar, until they meet. At this point Mr. Young and Mrs. Hall appear simultaneously on the doorstep of the Jones' house. Aha! A deep-dyed plot. Things are threateningly tragic until the Joneses, whose auto becomes disabled, return. Explanations corroborating the couple's protestations bring peace.

"THROUGH THE CLOUDS."—

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see,
Saw the vision of the world and all the wonders that would be.
Saw the heavens filled with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight, drooping down with costly bales.
Heard the heavens filled with shouting and there reigned a ghastly dew
From the Nations' airy navy grappling in the central blue. —Tennyson's "Locksley Holl."

Thus the grand poetic master sent his voice of prophecy out into the world nearly seventy years ago, in an age where biplanes, monoplanes and aeroplanes were unknown words to the human language, when even a common gas balloon was almost a seven days' wonder. People said a poet's fancy, a dreamer's dream, but dear old poet sage your dream of dreams to-day stands upon the edge of possibility and so it is small wonder that the Edison picture "Through the Clouds" should be brought into the fields of romance by the possibility of the aeroplane. A very up-to-datish picture that teams with modernism from aeroplanes to automobiles, from political graft to honest politician. A story with that dash and go that never lets the interest fag for a second and sweeps the spectator on to a splendid finish.

The first is a horse, an extraordinarily intelligent creature full of mischief. He plays pranks on everybody and makes more fun than a barrel of monkeys. He gets them all on the run and keeps them going to the limit.

The second is a dog as white as Italian marble and as smart as they make 'em. He impersonates prominent and eccentric characters. It's most comical and laughable to see how he does it. A regular rapid change artist.

Governor, and the opposing man is named Roberts, the latter being a thorough politician who realizes that Grey will easily defeat him in a fair fight, so he begins to deal in what some people call "good politics." In other words, he succeeds in throwing mud at his opponent through the paper by creating a rumor that Judge Grey had tried to bribe a certain contractor named O'Brien for political influence, with an offer of a ten-million dollar interstate water supply contract if elected Governor. This, of course, is false as far as Judge Grey is concerned, but not so with himself, Roberts. He has offered to throw this contract to O'Brien providing he will swear that the newspaper report is true. This O'Brien agrees to do, but not before he has forced Roberts to sign an agreement as to the facts of the deal in order to hold Roberts to his part of the bargain.

Jack Stanley, a young aviator, who is in love with Judge Grey's daughter, does not learn of the existence of the above incriminating paper until the late afternoon of the convention day and by a clever trick he succeeds in securing it and starts for the nearest railway station. Here he learns he will be unable to reach the convention hall in time, and so is forced to send a telegram to his sweetheart, telling her of his discovery and instructing her to meet him in her auto at such and such a field, as he is coming in his aeroplane. This fact is discovered by the opposing party and here follows the latest thing in motion picture stories, introducing the latest and fastest mode of travel. Of course, all is not accomplished without obstacles, these being a fight and many other thrilling happenings, but at last the young aviator arrives at the great convention hall in the nick of time and the convention is stampeded. Judge Grey is nominated for Governor and we are happy to say that he eventually becomes Governor of the state and the aviator, and the hero of the hour, wins the girl of his heart.

An Edison thriller without being sensational. A sustained interest that is fascinating, good, wholesome drama with plenty of dash and go and fairly bubbling over with the American spirit of "Succeed" and "Conquer."

"HIS MOTHER'S THANKSGIVING."—We are first introduced to an old-fashioned New England kitchen and dining-room combined where a few simple country folks have gathered to give their thanks to God for all the blessings that have been bestowed upon them, but our interest is centered mostly around the mother of the household and her son who are plain, simple New England folks. The son soon longs for a broader field for his ambition than the country village can give and so one day with gripsack in his hand, he bids his mother a fond goodbye and starts for the city with all its wonderful possibilities. Eight years glide by and the simple farm boy has grown to manhood and success has reached him from every side. He has climbed right up the ladder of opportunity until he stands to-day a man of means in business and a fashionably furnished home with liveried servants are at his command, while away back in New Engnland we still see the little mother just the same, a little older, a little grayer, but the same old dear face looks forth from beneath her glasses. A certain feverish anxiety is in her movements as she takes a big, old-fashioned pie from the oven. It is for her boy. He is coming home to spend Thanksgiving with her, for the first time in ten years. A knock is heard at the door and the rural postmaster hands the dear old lady a letter. It is from her son. After fussing and fuming she finds her glasses and tears open the letter, the smile fades from her lips, a check drops from the letter, but in there is a heartache, the boy is not coming home on Thanksgiving Day. As she takes his picture from the worn old album and looks at it sadly, part of the room fades and we see the boy and the other woman who loved him, too. A moment of suspense, eyes that look into eyes, a catch of the breath and as he clasps his sweetheart in his arms and presses the first long kiss of love upon her lips, we see the dear old mother sadly kissing the picture of her boy, too.

New England is a long way from the great city where her boy lives, but she has decided to go to him on Thanksgiving Day and surprise him. As she enters his house, she does not know that a Thanksgiving party is to be held, that her boy's sweetheart will be there in all her grandeur; that each guest will be dressed in the height of fashion. She does not realize that her old, worn-out clothes of the country will be out of place in these surroundings. She only knows that she is going to see her boy, but the sad awakening comes when she finds herself upstairs in a neatly furnished room and the butler placing a tray of food before her. Her boy is ashamed of her and she is to eat her Thanksgiving dinner alone. What would his sweetheart, a lady of fashion, think of her, his mother, if she saw her in this old-fashioned attire? What? Wait and you shall see. A knock at the door, a fair young girl enters, a rustle of silks and satin. "Ah, I beg your pardon, but I thought this is where the butler said I was to remove my cloak." She sees a huge, old-fashioned pie on the dresser, a note beside it and the words "my boy" and "your mother" catch her eye. There is a cry of joy and the dear old lady is locked close in the soft young arms. That's what she thinks of his mother. She is his mother, that's all she cares to know. Amidst sobs and smiles the girl learns the truth and one can imagine the shame upon the boy's face when he enters the room a few moments later and finds mother and sweetheart gaily eating their Thanksgiving dinner together. Soon all is forgiven and forgotten and this sweet, simple story closes with the dear old lady saying Thanksgiving at the head of her son's table amidst all the guests of fashion.

"A DAUGHTER OF THE MINES."—

Betty wasn't stylish
Betty wasn't grand
But you can bet
That Betty knew
Who had won her hand.

Betty wasn't haughty
Betty wasn't swell
But you can bet
That Betty knew
Just who loved her well.

And all the king's horses
And all the king's men
Couldn't make sweet, little Betty Bobbin
Single again.

And thus ran the old legend over a century ago and thus the same old story is enacted each day as this gay old world goes spinning sunward. It's the same to-day, to-morrow, yesterday. Love lights the way and young lovers go hand in hand off in the world, happy in their own sweet way, and thus it is in the Edison picture: "The Daughter of the Mines," whose name was Betty and you can bet that Betty knew who had won her hand, for it is none other than the Superintendent of the mine's son. Not because he was rich, and not because she was poor and her old dad was just one of those dirty black men that come pouring out of the mines at the mouth of the shaft as she stood waiting for him and met him with a glad cry of joy just the same as if he had been the President of the company. In some mysterious way little Betty Bobbin, also met handsome Harry North, the Superintendent's son. No one ever really knows how true lovers meet. Sometimes it's a smiling shy look and the work is done. Sometimes it's just an "excuse me, miss," and "thank you, kindly, sir." and the world is new again, and sometimes a man and woman have known each other all their lives when suddenly eyes meet eyes and life is a glad new thing. So what matters, how or when or where Betty Bobbin met Harry North. They met and kept on meeting as lovers always do, yet the stern, grand, old father of the boy knew it not nor the grey-haired old man. But love is a hard thing to hide and finally the truth came out and the rich man stormed and the poor man

GAUMONT.

"CAST INTO THE FLAMES;" OR, "NEBUCHADNEZZAR'S PRIDE."—"Nebucadnezzar, King of Babylon, having set up a golden image, commanded all the princes, governors, and all the populace, to gather together and worship the image. Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego refused to worship the image. In his rage and fury Nebuchadnezzar commanded them to be brought before him. Then Nebuchadnezzar commanded that they should heat the furnace and Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego were cast into it. And, lo: No hair of their head was singed, for the Son of God was there, and the flames harmed them not."

"A WOMAN'S WIT."—When he decided to get married the bachelor of our story "overlooked a bet." He did not count on his landlady, who deeply desired to keep her guest. Her strategy was successful, for by a series of practical and embarrassing tricks she managed to make him appear so ludicrous to his fiancee that the latter found another beau.

"CALINO TRAVELS AS A PRINCE."—Presenting the French comedian, who is becoming well known to the people of the United States under the name used in the title. In this particular film he plays the part of the porter to a European prince, and by skilful maneuvering manages to obtain his master's letters of credit and tickets for a pleasure trip in the Mediterranean. His attempts to appear cultured form many exceptionally amusing scenes.

"SAMSON'S BETRAYAL."—Delilah, tempted by the Philistines, resolves to betray Samson into their hands on payment of a sum of money. Delilah learns the secret of Samson's strength, which lies in his hair, and she causes a man to shave off the seven locks of Samson's head. And for this betrayal was Delilah paid by the Philistines eleven hundred pieces of silver.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

"BEHIND A MASK."—A finely-staged production, in an Elizabethan setting. The young wife of a commander in the army is insulted by a fashionable young man. The husband challenges him to a duel, and swords are about to be crossed when a message comes to the elder man that the enemy is advancing. He is forced to take the field, and the duel is postponed. The wife decides to fight her own battle, and sends a challenge to the disturber of domestic peace. The summons is accepted, when, masked, and dressed as a man, she fights with her adversary and overcomes him.

"NANTES AND ITS SURROUNDINGS." — This charming French town posseses many features of interest. One is a "hanging bridge"—a kind of suspension bridge across which passengers are carried in a cage traveling beneath the main body of the structure. Leaving the town, with its pleasant, well-built houses, we take a steamer trip along the river, encountering many delightful bits of scenery, which are beautifully photographed, and visiting a magnificent mediaeval pile, the Chateau de Clisson.

"NO PLACE LIKE HOME."—After a hard and weary day's work, Silas Green is sitting in the midst of his beloved ones, seeking a much needed rest. He is the proud father of six healthy children who thoroughly appreciate their father and for that reason make him the target of their pranks. They enjoy their ring-around-rosie best when they can get father in the center, and little Johnny is developing a talent for lassoing and after many attempts succeeds in getting his father in the sling. Mrs. Silas Green agrees with her husband that he would be able to secure a better rest by spending a vacation in some quiet hotel, so he packs his baggage, and as Sackville in the Pines holds forth great promise he makes that his destination.

We all know that the cab drivers are a greedy lot and for that reason Silas decides that a brick wagon will do the same service. He is not gone a very far way when a wheel breaks, the jolt scattering the bricks over poor Silas. He crawls from under the wagon in a sore condition and limps on to the end of his journey.

The hotel proprietor is of a rather flirty disposition who preferred to squander his valuable time on the pretty lady guests and therefore had little time for Silas. Nevertheless he is shoved into his room and Silas starts his rest. A beautiful blonde mistakes Silas' room for hers, and seeing Silas resting on a bed, her anger has no bound. He is pounced upon before given a chance to explain, after which she is very profuse in her excuses.

Next to his room two champion boxers are located, but as Silas had enough of this at home, he did not appreciate their efforts and considered their noise altogether unnecessary. He taps on the wall, which brings the two experts into his room and they give Silas a few lessons. After a series of similar disturbing incidents, he at last decides to rest on the lawn, takes his bed clothes with him. However, there the flirty proprietor comes along, accompanied by the beautiful blonde. They are so interested in each other they do not notice Silas—the proprietor carelessly throws a lighted match on him—the bed clothes start on fire and Silas is favored with a pail of water.

At last, it was too much for him, he returns home where he is received with open arms. He puts his suitcase on the floor and falls asleep on it, in the midst of his noisy youngsters.

"THE DULL RAZOR."—A regular disposition spoiler when you are in a great hurry to get downtown after a late dinner the night before, and find your razor pulls like a garden rake. Some people have been known to say things not in the ethical code of society.

"THE MERRY WIVES OF WINDSOR."—A quaint old tavern almost in the shadow of Windsor Castle, frequented by Falstaff and his associates, furnishes an admirable background for the introduction of the immortal Shakespeare comedy.

Seated at the garden table and being served by Anna Page—conversation waxes warm and Falstaff quarrels with his friends, but not losing an opportunity to enter into a flirtation with the fair Anna and in his conceit gloats over his conquest. Mrs. Page and Mrs. Ford become objects of his wistful eye—he confides his intentions to his companions and announces that he will write them both a letter declaring his admiration. Unfortunately, Mr. Ford overhears the reading of the message to his wife. At this juncture Mr. and Mrs. Page and Mrs. Ford arrive and a cordial greeting ensues. Ford plainly shows his jealousy and is bent upon revenge.

As the company retire to their respective places of abode, Falstaff despatches his servant post haste to deliver the notes to the two ladies—while Ford watches from a secret hiding—a hurried visit from Mrs. Page reveals the fact that both letters are identical. "Let it suffice thee, Mistress Page, that I love thee: I will not say, pity me; 'tis not a soldier-like phrase; but I say love me. By me, John Falstaff." They decide upon a plan to reply that the husband will be absent from his home between 10 and 11 o'clock. Ford, in disguise, follows the maid as she goes to deliver the letter—arriving at Falstaff's he engages him in conversation and learns the contents of the letter and at once hastens to the market rounding up friends to help search his house.

Falstaff, undecided which of the two he will first call upon, decides it shall be Mrs. Ford. In the midst of his proffers of love, Mrs. Page announces husband—confusion follows, Falstaff is concealed in the clothes basket with the dirty linen—the servants are ordered to carry the basket out and it is dumped in the lagoon, which causes Falstaff much uneasinesss as well as a dampened ardor, for love making. Yet upon making his escape he is undaunted and again meets Mrs. Ford when a loud knocking at the door sends them all in confusion and the clothes basket is refused as a haven, but an old outfit of the housemaid serves as a disguise and he is quickly hustled out. Explanations and reconciliation between the Pages and the Fords are soon complete and Falstaff is invited to meet Mrs. Page. In the fairy glade—Will o' the wisps—fairies—demons, etc., break in upon the love scene and Falstaff is crowned with buck horns and all ends in merriment and closes a picture of Shakespeare's best comedy.

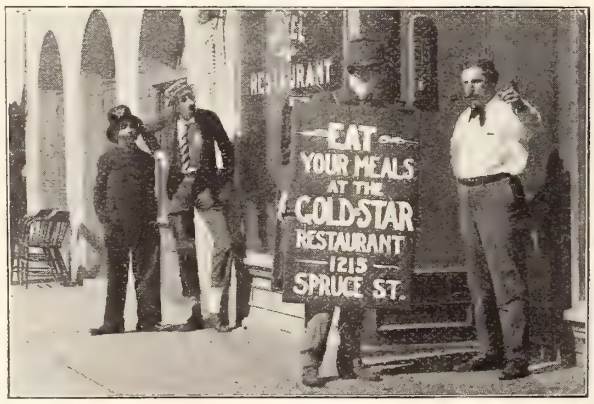
"HANK AND LANK."—Hank and Lank have inside information that it's meal time, but it looks as if they they would have to skip a meal or two until Hank's fertile brain maps out a royal road to a big feed. Into the "Ragout Restaurant" goes Hank, and soon returns wearing a pair of large signboards proclaiming the goodness of the bill of fare at the eating house. Hank is rewarded by a fine feed, for he has managed to steer a large crowd to the restaurant.

Now it's Lank's turn. He has seen how easily Hank earned the big eats, and loses no time in applying to the "Apax" restaurant. They have seen that the rival house has increased its patronage by advertising, and Lank soon is at large upon the community with a pair of boards which the name "Apax" appears in large letters.

But carrying the heavy sandwich is strenuous work, and Lank stops frequently to rest. While loafing on a corner two boys, intent upon mischief, fix upon him as a likely victim. A painter happens along at this moment, and they appropriate his paint and brushes. Stealing up behind the unsuspecting Lank, they quickly obliterate the letter "X" from his sign.



Lank innocently strolls away, followed by Hank, who has come upon the scene in time to see the fun.

Lank's wanderings lead him to an alley where a gang of Irish laborers are eating their noonday lunch. Lank thinks that this is an auspicious place to display the restaurant ad, and walks boldly by. However, these loyal sons of Erin do not welcome an invitation to eat at the "A. P. A." restaurant. A box of newly mixed mortar is convenient for their purposes, and Lank is treated to a most "mortarfying" bath in the plastic material.

"THAT POPULAR TUNE."—Blinks goes to the theatre, where he hears it first. Mlle. Tinee sings it, is repeatedly encored and continues to sing it until Blinks leaves the theatre in disgust.

Blinks enters a restaurant, orders a big meal and is about to eat heartily when the orchestra merrily strikes up the latest rag, "Twinkling Eyes." Blinks upsets his table and after dousing the musicians—and everyone else—with a cold spray from the seltzer bottle, angrily leaves the restaurant.

Blinks goes to his office and finds his stenographer humming the piece, and Johnny, the office boy, playing it on a mouth organ. Blink destroys both the sheet music and the mouth organ and in disgust leaves the office.

He enters a barber shop and is in the midst of a shave when the colored bootblack whistles it gayly, whereat Blinks leaps from the chair, and upsetting the surprised darkey, dashes out of the door.

Blinks goes home, but is again upset when his neighbors in the flat below begin singing and playing "Twinkling Eyes." Blink goes down and insists on their cutting out the music. For his pains Blinks is thrown out of the window and alights at the feet of an Italian organ grinder, who is also playing the new air.

Night comes, and Blinks goes to bed, but the little German band comes serenading him with their choice selection, "Twinkling Eyes." Blinks hurls a pitcher of water at the musicians, then returns to bed. But in his dreams he re-lives the scenes of the day, while the melody of that popular tune continues to ring in his ears.

Blinks awakens and gives up hope, while his rolling eyes and the painful droop of his mouth indicate that he is another candidate for the dippy house.

PATHE FRERES.

"THE OLD LONGSHOREMAN."—On the bustling quay a number of dock men are waiting to be taken on for unloading of some cargo. Amongst them is an old longshoreman, who is told that he is too old for the work on hand. He wanders along, and at last is successful in persuading one of the foremen to give him a job. His strength, however, is not equal to the task, and he falls beneath his burden. Hopeless and desperately hungry, he proceeds to a soup kitchen, but arrives too late for the free distribution, and wearily turns again in quest of work. Presently he comes on a bright little girl eating and dancing on her way. In an instant he has snatched from her the roll she is eating, and makes his way to the quay. After him runs the crying child. She reaches the quay side close upon his heels, but a false step suddenly precipitates her into the water. She struggles desperately, and hearing her cry, the brave old stevedore plunges into the water to rescue her. He drags her back into safety, but, alas, the effort has exhausted all his remaining strength, and with one last vain attempt to stand upright, he falls dead upon the quay.

"NEW SOUTH WALES GOLD MINE."—This picture illustrates the breaking up of auriferous earth by means of powerful jets of water brought from the mountains by heavy pressure, and pumped through immense pumps at the rate of about 880 gallons per minute. The washing of the gold, the separation of its impurities and its refinement are all successively shown in detail. The daily output of the mine amounts to about 412 ounces of gold.

"HOW RASTUS GETS HIS TURKEY."—It is the day before Thanksgiving, and Rastus, who is as black as ink, and without a cent to his name, has promised himself that, come what may, his wife Eliza and his day. Prowling round the local butchers he watches daughter shall eat of a plump turkey the following the stock of birds gradually dwindle without having the opportunity to take one unobserved. At last he becomes desperate, and when old George Green purchases the last bird he sees that his only chance is to take it from him by hook or by crook. Arriving home, Green takes the turkey out in the yard to kill it. While he turns away for a few minutes to sharpen his knife, Rastus puts his hand through a hole in the wooden fence and seizes the bird. The hole is not large enough to pull the bird through, but Rastus tries to do so, with the result that he pulls three of the planks of the fence out, and with his hand through these and still holding on to the turkey like grim death, he bolts for home. Green starts in pursuit, but Rastus soon gets away from him, although he has many a laughable difficulty to overcome, for his stony brain could not see that he could not take the turkey in the other hand and drop the three boards. When Thanksgiving Day arrived the following morn Rastus and his family had a great time over the dinner and it certainly is an amusing end to a good picture to watch them greedily eat it.

"WONDERFUL PLATES."—A little Dutch girl is washing her plates of delft. Struck with the beauty of the scenes painted on them she holds them up to look more closely, and the painted pictures become slowly animate. Windmills, their huge sails revolving, are seen upon the first plate. Then, on the next ones groups of Dutch children in serried rank and amusing posture are to be seen. Many quaint scenes are thus seen until at last all the plates are washed and put away. The little girl then sinks down by the side of the fire and dreams of the fancies and

The Song of the Wildwood Flute

An Indian Subject Incorporating Traditional Customs.

This Biograph subject is unique in the extreme. It tells the story of two Indian braves who are rivals for the affection of a pretty little Indian maid. During the telling of the story many traditional customs are introduced. First, the "Corn Dance," which is a ceremonial dance done in honor and gratitude to the Great Master for the crops harvested. At this dance the little squaw becomes impressed with the one brave. The lovemaking is done by the playing of the love flute outside the maiden's tepee. Her appearance gives assent. Then the presentation of skins to the father. The rival plays the love flute, which can be hired from the regular village custodian, but without success. The favored brave is married and starts off on a hunting trip. He falls into a bear pit and is destined to perish, for his rival, seeing his predicament, leaves him to his fate. The woe of the little squaw, however, softens the unsuccessful suitor, and he goes to the assistance of the husband and brings him to his squaw.

HIS NEW LID

This is a very funny comedy, showing what awful anxiety may be induced by the exchange of hats in a restaurant. Jenks goes to lunch, his head topped off with a new straw hat. An exchange is made and the new possessor of Jenks' hat loses it overboard. It is found and the name inside is conclusive evidence that Jenks has been sent to a watery grave. He is mourned as dead, and it takes some argument on his part to convince his wife and friends that he is alive and not a spook when he appears before them.

Approximate Length, 563 feet.

NOT SO BAD AS IT SEEMED

Appearances are deceiving and circumstantial evidence should be taken with caution. In this Biograph subject the circumstances were apparently very compromising. Mr. and Mrs. Jones go away for a week, and Jones writes a note to Mr. Hall telling him to continue his use of the library during his absence just as usual. Mrs. Jones writes to Mrs. Young, asking her to look after the bird while she, Mrs. Jones, is away. Each neighbor goes to do their friends' bidding and is accused by their respective wife and hubby of being a party to a clandestine meeting. The Joneses meet with an auto breakdown and are forced to return, and fortunately, too, for there is the needed explanation.

"ISIS."—Isis was the great Moon Goddess of the Egyptians. She is the protectress of Thyrsa, a beautiful singer, for whom she chooses Prince Dilo as husband, sending him a message to that effect. The prince seeks out Thyrsa, and charmed with her grace and beauty, is more than willing to marry her and discard Sara, his former favorite. Sara, however, jealous of her rival, informs Dilo that Thyrsa has other lovers, and the Prince, giving vent to his scorn and repugnance for the singer, returns to his palace. Thyrsa is humiliated, the more so that she loves Dilo deeply. Heartsick, she carries her grief to the Moon Goddess, who, taking pity on her, declares that Dilo shall be punished. Taking on the form of flesh and blood, she descends from her seat in the temple, and appearing to Dilo in his sleep, creates in his heart a love for herself. Dilo, springing up out of his sleep, follows her blindly until she reaches the temple, when, after slowly mounting the steps to her seat, she changes back into lifeless stone.

"A DOG'S INSTINCT."—Irene Donald is employed at a milliner's, and as usual at midday, her maid sends Fido, the faithful black poodle, to bring her home. On her way home Irene is annoyed by the attentions of a man, and he, angered at her refusal to speak to him, follows her home and notes her address. Irene enters the apartment and sits down to her lunch, but Fido's instinct tells him there is something wrong, and he runs downstairs and follows the stranger, who proceeds to an old hut, where he meets a band of ruffians. The dog sneaks in, hides under the bed and hears the conspiracy. He then proceeds homewards, but is taken by a zealous police officer and locked up at the station house for being at large without muzzle. Meantime it is time for Irene to go home, but on her way she is waylaid and made prisoner. The dog escapes from his prison, goes to the milliner's and finds Irene has started for home already. He then rushes home, finds Irene has not made her appearance, and signifies to the maid to follow him. He takes her to the police station and persuades the police to accompany them. They all follow the faithful dog, who leads them to the old hut, where, after a short struggle, they soon overcome Irene's jailers and free her.

"AN ELEVENTH HOUR REDEMPTION."—John and William Strangely, two brothers, are both in love with Catherine Miller, but it does not take Will very long to see that he has no chance, and that it is John whom Catherine prefers. Three years pass by, and John and Catherine, happily married with a little two-year-old babe, are living on their ranch. Will comes in one morning to see them, and he finds his admiration for Catherine has not diminished. A bronco breaks away from the corral. John, Will and some of the help mount and follow in pursuit. An overhanging bough sweeps John from his horse. The others take him back to the ranch badly bruised and shaken. The doctor, who is called in, orders absolute quiet, as any shock might be fatal. Will takes from the mantel in the parlor a photo of Catherine and slips it in his pocket. She enters and he tries to make love to her. There is a scuffle. John hears it and enters. The effort is too much. He falls dead. Will rides off, and overcome with remorse,

A STORY OF EARLY DAYS IN THE COLONIES

Released Friday, December 2. Length, 945 Feet.

Chief Squantum, a noted Pequod Indian, on the death of his squaw, places his young boy in the charge of Elder Alden, a very much respected Puritan settler.

As the young man grew up, instead of feeling love and gratitude for those with whom he had passed his childhood, he developed hatred for his white friends, eventually leaving them and fleeing to the Indians, whom he incited to attack Alden's log cabin.

The battle between the Indians and the cabin's defenders is one of the most exciting and historically true portrayals ever presented in motion photography.

"SUSPICION."—Unfounded suspicion will often lead to a hasty conclusion to be repented for at leisure.

Mrs. Hall's little child dies and she grieves herself into an almost complete breakdown. Her husband and her doctor advise her to desist.

In order to satisfy the longings of her nature and seek consolation she interests herself in an orphanage, where she goes every day, unknown to her husband, to care for and help the little ones. She sews for them, loves to assist them in their play and she places a memorial tablet in the playroom of the home in memory of her daughter.

Mr. Hall notices that his wife goes out every day, and that she is hiding something from him. He becomes suspicious and engages a detective to watch her. The detective follows her to the childrens' home, sees her enter the place with a gentleman, and reports to Mr. Hall.

The husband goes to the orphanage with the detective. They gain entrance to the building and hear the wife talking in one of the rooms. They rush in and find Mrs. Hall surrounded by the little ones. The husband is nonplussed and abashed. The gentleman who was seen entering the institution with Mrs. Hall comes into the room, hands Mr. Hall his card, "Albert H. Houston, Superintendent of Bethany Home." Mr. Hall now feels heartily ashamed of his suspicion, and completely overcome when his wife leads him to the tablet and he reads:

THE PLAY ROOM, BETHANY ORPHAN ASYLUM.
The Gift of Mrs. A. J. Hall
In memory of her daughter, Helen, who died September 1, 1910,
Aged eight years.

The children, superintendent and the detective leave the room. Left to themselves, Mrs. Hall places her hand tenderly on his shoulder and he sorrowfully asks her forgiveness for his unjust and unkind suspicions.

"A FOUR-FOOTED PEST."—"The horse has four legs, one on each corner." This is a four-footed horse, one of man's most faithful friends, excepting an automobile, which is not a horse. Well, this horse is called a pest, which is a peculiar kind of animal, because he is only a mischievous horse that knows and does a whole lot of things that make a whole lot of fun that keeps his victims busy and the rest of us laughing.

He runs away, dumps his driver into a mudpuddle, unties a woman's clothesline, letting the clothes fall in the dirt. He is chased by the woman and an ever-increasing crowd. He runs to the seashore, makes off with the wraps of the bathers, and they join in the chase and add to the fun and excitement.

The next thing this pesky horse does is to pull a newspaper out of a man's hand while the man is seated on a bench in the park, next to an old lady, to whom the horse turns his attention and eats the flowers from her bonnet, pulls it off, and the old lady's wig with it. The man and woman start in pursuit. Then he puts his head in a kitchen window, eats up a freshly cooked pie, and gets away with it, followed by the cooks.

A party of children playing on the lawn see the mischievous animal, and try to drive him away. The horse seizes the hose, turns on the water and gives the youngsters a ducking. The chase is a merry one but our four-footed friend out-distances all hands, reaching his stable, where he awaits their coming, and when they arrive gives them all a laugh and an encore of "ha! ha! ha!," which the onlookers enjoy and re-echo with peals and roars of merriment.

"THE STATUE DOG."—This is a real dog with an unusual amount of intelligence. He is an actor dog, a regular impersonator and poser. He works entirely alone in tableau because he can do all but talk. He is called "the statue dog," because he is a pure white bulldog who looks like marble when he stands like the statue of Apollo Belvidere, Juno, or Paris. Fine work, showing the possibilities of even a canine who has been treated and trained right and knows how to do things right.

He is a clever comedian, as shown in his ackermanerian Hebrew portrayals, Irish, German and eccentric characters, perfect likenesses, true to life. His ability as an impersonator and rapid change artist are shown in his representations of Roosevelt, Emperor Wilhelm, Joe Cannon, William Randolph Hearst and other noted characters. Last, but not least, he gives an impersonation of the Vitagraph eagle embracing the company's trade mark. This sounds strange, but 'tis true, and marvelously strange because 'tis true.

This subject is run in conjunction with "The Four-Footed Pest," and will prove a very novel and enjoyable amusement.

"LOVE, LUCK AND GASOLINE."—A young man and girl; the girl has a father. The young man, "Bob" by name, is in love with the girl, and her father objects to him as a suitor and very much favors another man as a future son-in-law, whom we designate as the villain. The scenes surrounding this state of affairs are at the seashore and a beautiful harbor containing motor boats and yachts that are incidentally and dramatically part of the play.

"Bob" is elected Commodore of the local yacht club, defeating the villain as a candidate for the same office. The villain, who wants the girl, never fails to show his dislike for "Bob," and, furthermore, he is naturally disagreeable, as shown in his refusal to subscribe to the building fund of the local church, entirely snubbing the Rev. Jones, who is the pastor, soliciting donations for the good work among the members of the club, all of whom, and even the skipper of the "Vita," a small speed motor boat, contributes to the purpose and at the same time takes considerable pleasure in satisfying Mr. Jones' curiosity in the workings of his craft.

The villain becomes impatient and sore at the aversion Mollie displays to his attentions and proposals to her; she refuses him. He tells her father. The old gentleman is very angry, and, to separate her from Bob, threatens to send her abroad.

Mollie sends word to Bob of her father's decision and suggests that they be married at once. Bob gets his motor boat, "Esmeralda," ready, meets Mollie, and they make for Newport, where they will be married. The villain sees them going and informs Mollie's father, who follows, but they are too late to reach her—she and Bob are well on their way and far out to sea.

The villain and the father jump aboard the "Ethel," and they follow the lovers. The "Esmeralda's" machinery goes wrong and the "Ethel" is fast gaining on them. Bob rushes to the wireless with which the "Esmeralda" is equipped and tells the operator to wire Rev. Jones to hire the "Vita," instruct the skipper to catch the "Esmeralda" before the "Ethel" reaches them and marry him and Mollie at once.

The preacher runs to the dock, tells the skipper, and they get in the little speed boat and are off like a flash, cutting the waves like a knife, throwing the spray in showers of foam. Reaching the "Esmerralda" in less time that it takes to tell it, Mollie and Bob are taken into the "Vita" and the race is resumed. Rev. Jones performs the ceremony while the boat is ploughing and skimming through the water, and the two lovers are married; the father is defeated and the villain vanquished.

MUCH WORK FOR N. Y. M. P. OPERATORS.

According to William Lang, business representative of the New York branch of the Motion Picture Operators' Union, that branch of the I. A. T. S. E., will have to get busy in the near future in order to accomplish what the Boston branch and branches in other cities are doing. Just at present, claims Mr. Lang, the men are willing to see things done, that will be of a benefit to the organization, but little effort on their part is being exerted.

At two of their recent meetings, little of business importance has been accomplished, and unless the members pull together more, the other organizations will have the New Yorkers beaten to a finish.

Mr. Lang reports that business is good in New York and that managers seem to have work for all good operators. In the union there are three hundred members, all who have passed both the state and union examination. The union now has new quarters at 359 West 43d street.

The meeting between the Alliance committee and the Sales Company, set for Thursday, Nov. 10, in New York City, was again postponed a week. It looks as if the Sales Company were practicing the old stalling game.

B. W. Everett, of Scott & Everett, this city, reports excellent business in his three theatres—the Palace, at 18th and Halsted streets; the Grand at 12th and Paulina, and the York at York and Paulina streets. Pictures at all three houses are exhibited in a well lighted auditorium, and care is exercised to give an appropriate musical accompaniment to each picture. The General Film Co., at 85 Dearborn street, furnishes a high class service for each house.

Mr. O'Day, who had much to do in arranging for the filming of the Jeffries-Johnson fight pictures, in conjunction with Mr. W. T. Rock, stopped over in Chicago, on his way to the Coast from New York, and was the guest for a day of John B. Rock.

I met A. L. Cooley, manager of the People's theatre, Laurium, Mich., a new house which is said to be one of the largest houses in the Wolverine State, at the General Film Co., 85 Dearborn street, last week, where he was arranging for a high quality service. Mr. Cooley tells me that the People's cost $7,500, and that it will seat 780 people. Mr. Cooley claims that he is one of the oldest operators in the picture business, and that he ran the first motion picture machine ever used in this country. That was in Brooklyn, N. Y., for Charles Lumiere, at the corner of Fulton and Wasington streets, 19 years ago.

Charles Vance, owner and manager of the Dreamland theatre, Streator, Ill., was seen one day last week, and he reported excellent business in his home city. Nothing but motion pictures are used in the Dreamland. There are no "independent" houses in Streator.

George B. Frellson, proprietor and manager of the Unique theatre, Waukesha, Wis., was interviewed at 85 Dearborn street, last week, where he was arranging for bookings with the General Film Co. Manager Frellson formerly obtained his service from the Western Exchange in Milwaukee. The Unique seats 400 people, and Mr. Frellson told me that he will build an addition next summer, so as to accommodate 500 people. Pictures are the sole entertainment at the Unique, and the patrons demand one of the best services that can be secured.

A VITAGRAPH NIGHT WITH MR. MAURICE COSTELLO.

At the Fulton Auditorium, Brooklyn, N. Y., last Tuesday evening, about 1,600 people attended the three performances and reception at the "Vitagraph Night" given to Mr. Maurice Costello. About three hundred persons were unable to gain admittance.

After he had been introduced by the Vitagraph Company's representative, Mr. Costello made a very interesting and witty address in which he thanked them for the cordial response to the announcement of his name and gave them an insight into some of the features of the art of motion picture acting, its difficulties and its inspiration. Mr. Cranides was congratulated on the beauty and comfort of his theatre and the exceedingly refined audiences which patronize his place.

At the close of the entertainments and reception Mr. Cranides surprised Mr. Costello with a very choice spread at the "Ormande" and incidentally presented him with a gold monogramed scarf pin and pair of cuff buttons of the same pattern. The gift was entirely unexpected by Mr. Costello and it was some time before he could express his appreciation and thanks.

The Park Row Theatre, New York, will have a "Vitagraph Night," wth Mr. Costello as their guest on Friday, November 25th.

HUNT TIGERS WITH PICTURE CAMERA.

Professor Frederick Starr, of Chicago, Ill., is looking for demons and tigers. The University of Chicago anthropologist is going to Korea, where fierce felines and evil spirits abound. He will leave Dec. 22 for a six months' investigation of his latest specialties. He will take a complete motion-picture outfit. He expects to measure the heads of the Koreans, witness a tiger hunt, attend a native demon-worship ceremony and take authentic photographs of each and every occurrence of interest. Manuel Gonzales, Professor Starr's adopted son, who has accompanied him to many foreign parts, will be his only companion.

PHOTOPLAY HOUSES UP TO REQUIREMENTS

The proprietors of photoplay theatres, of Montreal, Que., are coming forward with their certificates to prove efficient electric wiring, and as in other respects Building Inspector Chausse does not report any that do not come up to requirements as to safety, authorities in Recorder's Court in whose hands Mr. Chausse's report was placed do not think any action will be taken against any proprietor.

The new Star theatre, remodeled in its entirety, was thrown open to Sandusky theatregoers Oct. 29. Three first run films to be shown were "The Telephone," Vitagraph; and "The Banquet" and "Hank and Lank Take a Rest," Essanay. The music was furnished by Unckrich Bros.' orchestra, and Christy Taubert will be the pianist and sing the illustrated songs.

MORE "REGARDING EDUCATIONAL FILM"

Can any one man decide what is good and what is not, in scenics and industrials?

By EPES WINTHROP SARGENT (Chicot)

IN a recent issue of The Film Index W. H. K. throws three fits and a somersault because a recent "scenic" showed a "flock" of llamas through an Andean village instead of showing the Andes themselves.

About the same time W. H. K. sent a "holler" to the writer that would suggest that he lived in Harlem instead of Newark about those same first cousins to the goats. Those llamas appear to have grated upon or, perhaps, butted into his soul. He wanted to see the majestic Andes—forgetting that the Pathe Freres attended to that long ago; but he didn't happen to be in the house the night it was run—and he wailed for a look at Niagara Falls like the brave water-wagon rider that he is.

Funny how everybody wails for Niagara Falls like every bridal couple east of Chicago and yet George Kline must have about a mile of Niagara Falls in his educational catalogue.

And the same day that W. H. K. wept because of the gentle llamas, the dining car conductor of the Reading "two-hour" that leaves the lair of Lubin at seven o'clock on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, had his wail.

"See that man I was talking to," he asked. "He's just back from India and he told me a lot about that country. Funny some of you fellows don't give us India, and places like that, instead of Niagara Falls. I took my lay off last week and went into a place on Market street. Gee! They had Niagara Falls and I ran there all one summer. Who cares about the Falls?"

And there you have it, if not in a nutshell, in two paragraphs. One man had seen Niagara Falls and did not want to see it or them again. The other man worships water as the only potable fluid and yearns for it in large doses. And there's the man who wants what he has seen to see if the camera lies.

Long years ago J. Austin Fynes told the writer that the reason the Lumiere Cinematograph was bounced from the Keith theatres was because they could not give enough local stuff, on account of having to send the exposed negative back to France for development and printing. There were some other reasons, but the fact remains that "Deadman's Curve," just an even hundred feet from the theatre, was a bigger hit than any foreign subject the Lumiere people put out, not even excepting those two babies who were the stars just then. And against "Deadman's Curve," the Biograph offered the Empire State Express and Haverstraw tunnel.

But this last is begging the question. It is neither a scenic nor an educational. It was a "local"—most potent of attractions. If the writer had money enough to start a theatre he would make a photograph on the local "four corners" every Saturday afternoon and thousands of people would crowd his house to see if they did get in the picture. The personal appeal is irresistable—sometimes—but the Vitagraph has a picture of the fat writer trying to slide off a camel that would not kneel when his Shrine robe caught on the saddle, that the Board of Censors should see. There are some exceptions to all rules.

Seriously, there is meat in what the scenario writer wrote, and as much in what the Pullman conductor said. Both of them wanted scenics, but they wanted what they wanted and it did not mean the same thing. The answer is to give both and then both will be satisfied. The man who cares not for llamas would stand for them if he got an occasional Niagara Falls, and the man to whom Niagara Falls was the end of the day's work would not mind if he could have the llamas.

The trouble is that the average exhibitor seems to think that he is running a theatre and that therefore plays must be given. To him the scenic or industrial is merely a filler—a bit of film stuck on the end of a reel.

Is that either right or just to a concern like Pathe Freres, who range from the Arctic to the Antartic in search of subjects? Is it business? That's what is going to hit the exhibitor.

For a long time—even before he heard of the Kline catalogue, the writer has spoken for the scenic and industrial, broadly the educational though educational in redolent of school days. The day is not far distant when the educational exchange will be as important as the general agency, if not more so. It will carry nothing but educational stuff and it will appeal to schools whose Boards of Education is not sufficiently affluent to own its own films. Sounds like a dream, doesn't it? But!

Last summer the writer did the Vitagraph description of Major Andre for the Vitagraph bulletin. He had studied history in his school days and claims to be as well informed as the average, but he never had a history lesson like that. It stuck. That's the answer.

Masons of a higher degree know that the lessons of the fourth degree to the thirty-second degree are conveyod to the candidate in the form of a drama rather than a lecture and all will admit that it stuck. In the same way the history lesson that is shown in pictures will stick long after the dull page has faded from memory.

In the primary classes of to-day the pupil can read long before he knows his letters. He is taught pictures of words and he reads while he does not know "b" from "d." The motion picture is a glorified and entirely practical amplification of the same idea.

The dunderhead opponent of the pictures—the man who has to oppose something—claims that children rob and assault and run away because they see it in the pictures. Children are imitative, but not to the extent of the small scamp who robs a candy store and uses the appeal. But since they are imitative give them something to imitate—give them the right sort of industrials.

The exhibitor has it in his power to anticipate the action of the schools; to extend the course. Suppose, for instance, that an exhibitor has a place close to a school. Suppose he finds out exactly what his film exchange has on its shelves in the way of geographical or historical films. Suppose a certain class has reached Borneo in its studies and suppose he takes the Borneo reel for a special subject about that time.

Suppose again that the teacher doesn't have to buy a ticket when she comes to the show and suppose she tells the kiddies that the scenes in Borneo are to be seen at the Almazan theatre. Won't those kiddies get the dime or nickel —"to see Borneo"—and won't they enjoy the show outside of that and want to come again? And can anyone blame them, because the show is "so helpful in their geography." And some bone headed exhibitors dig deep in the discard for the old time blood and thunder stuff, that was on earth before the Board of Censors came, and use weird oaths down cellar when a small three hundred foot scenic rounds out a reel.

There are lots of exhibitors who can see so small a space beyond their eyes that they can't see when their eyeglasses get dirty. Get busy, you people who want Niagara Falls and India and even llamas. Make a shout for the educational in proper proportion and anticipate the inevitable but meanwhile don't kick because the other fellow gets what he wants and you don't. It's all coming and it's coming swift and sure.

NEW GRAND A HOUSE BEAUTIFUL

Manager Montgomery Expects To Do Leading Business in Jacksonville—Kalem and Selig People in Southern City

No doubt one of the most popular attractions for northern visitors in Jacksonville, Fla., during the winter season, will be the new Grand photoplay theatre. This most modern little picture house, with its seating capacity of 500, is one of the most up-to-date theatres of its kind in the whole of "Dixie," and the entertainment given by Manager F. T. Montgomery, is equal to any given in the largest cities.

During the past couple of years, Jacksonville has had quite an awakening in the motion picture business; first class photoplay theatres have sprung up there, and other cities in Florida, and the winter tourist often makes these places a second resort. In the first class photoplay theatres one can often see the best society folk attending these performances and enjoying them as they would some metropolitan production.

The Grand photoplay theatre, since being practically rebuilt, should be the main center of attraction this coming season. The house is 40 by 90 feet and contains all the luxuries and safety appliances to be found in any northern or western house. In the machine booth are to be found both an Edison and an Edengraph machine of the latest model. Besides a four-piece orchestra, Manager Montgomery has just given an order for a large pipe organ, which will be used for playing overtures and sacred music.

One of the latest Simpson Solar screens has also been added, as the management is a great believer in light houses. The new screen is greatly adding to the patronage of the house and the southerners are much pleased to know that pictures can be displayed in the light. This late modern device also has a tendency to greatly add to the popularity of motion pictures in that section of the country.

Just at present the Kalem and Selig players are in Jacksonville, and they are creating much enthusiasm in that part of the South. According to Mr. Montgomery both companies are taking some excellent pictures and the public will soon be treated to some novelties in the way of motion pictures.

MANAGERS CO-OPERATE WITH CENSORS.

A general crusade to uplift the moral tone of the films that are shown in Baltimore photoplay houses before young children has been launched. A meeting was held last week by about twenty members of local clubs and associations at the home of Mrs. Howard Elmer Asbury, 1017 Cathedral street, when the move was inaugurated. The plan adopted was to seek the co-operation of the managers of the local photoplay houses and to secure their consent to their pictures being shown before a board of censors each week so that such as pass muster may be visited during certain hours in the day by children unaccompanied by adults.

Several photoplay proprietors have already consented, it is said, to co-operate with this committee, and the latter feels that all of the other show managers of the city will see the need of such a censorship and come into the move later on. One show proprietor has already given the committee a private view of his films and a censored selection of these will be displayed for children at his house on next Saturday morning from 10 o'clock in the morning until 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

Among those who took part in the meeting were representatives of the Moral Education Board, Social Settlement School Board, Mothers' Club of Baltimore, Women's Christian Temperance Union, Sons of the American Revolution, Society of Social Hygiene, Oratorio Society, and the Young People's Association.

GARRICK PHOTOPLAY THEATRE SOLD.

The Garrick, a well patronized and popular photoplay theatre, on Sycamore street, near Twenty-first, Cairo, Ill., was sold last week to Mrs. C. Blanks. The house seats about 350 persons, and runs only the best of licensed pictures. It is the intention of Mrs. Blanks to have the house practically rebuilt by next spring.

WILL SET UP HOUSE IN CENTRALIA.

Parker Gillespie and Harmon Ferguson have gone to Centralia, Ill., where they will open a first class motion picture show. Both young men have experience along this line of work and know what it takes to please the public. In addition to being thoroughly posted on their business, they are fine young men and will be an excellent addition to the business circles of Centralia.

A new photoplay theatre is being erected at 547 Penn street, Philadelphia, Pa. The house will be called "The Penn." The entertainment comprises of three reels of the latest licensed pictures.

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"PUT YOU ARMS AROUND ME, HONEY."—Words by Junie McCree; music by Albert Von Tilzer; published by York Music Co. A pretty little number, sung with great success by Elizabeth Murray in Madame Sherry, now playing at New Amsterdam Theatre, New York City. A fitting climax to the successes from these writers for the past year. Slides that are in every way up to the new high standard of perfection of this firm are produced for this song, which because of their artistic setting and photographic excellence should be popular with all picture theatre goers.

"WINTER."—Words by Alfred Bryan; music by Albert Gumble; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co., New York. This song, first introduced with overwhelming success by Miss Adele Ritchie, of comic opera fame, will survive many winters, also summers, and is a predestined hit. Some most fascinating snow and winter scenes abound in this set of slides. They are so realistic that they create in us a desire for that season's early arrival. If you want a set that's "in season," get this one.

Scott & Van Altena.

"OH! YOU RAH! RAH! BOY."—Words by Jack Mahoney; music by Theodore Morse; published by Theodore Morse Pub. Co., New York. A catchy song illustrated with slides that in posing, photography and coloring are typically Scott & Van Altena.

"PLAIN LITTLE COUNTRY GIRL."—Words by J. Brandon Walsh; music by Al. W. Brown; published by Victor Kremer, Chicago. A cute song with anything but a plain set of slides. We might better call these illustrations "portrayals," because they depict to us better than any painting the country phase of life. When song slide makers give us "studies of life," there is, indeed, a great advancement in this line of business.

"SIGHING."—Lyric and music by Leroy Stover; published by Harold Rossiter Music Co., Chicago. A sentimental ballad, with slides of the usual high order love-ballad style of Scott & Van Altena.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"KELLY'S GONE TO KINGDOM COME."—Words by Sax Rohmer; music by T. W. Thurban; published by Will Rossiter. The song that Maude Lambert, the dainty commedienne, featured in Lew Fields' "Midnight Sons." In the slides Simpson has shown a real aeroplane, Kelly under the ocean, Kelly in an airship, and any number of humorous situations. Most of these pictures were made during the recent International Aviation Meet.

"STAR OF MY DREAMS SHINE ON."—Lyric by Arthur J. Lamb; music by John T. Hall. These two well-known composers need no introduction to music lovers, as they are known wherever songs are sung. This new ballad is even better than their average. Simpson has made a set of slides which in every way suit the lyrics to a T.

Levi Company, Inc.

"THAT CERTAIN PARTY RAG."—Words by Edgar Selden; music by Tom Kelly, writers of the big song hit, "I'm Looking for a Dear Old Lady." This song has a strain that is simply tantalizing and it will only be a question of a short time before it will be hummed and whistled everywhere. The slides are good, showing clever characteristic posing and rich coloring.

"A LASSIE BY THE SEA."—Words and music by Bernice Phillips; published by Phillips Music Co., Dorchester, Mass. This song is about a sailor boy bidding his sweetheart good bye and makes an excellent song for illustration. The slides are exceptionally well done, the models good looking and the coloring excellent.

Excelsior Slide Co.

"THAT LOVIN' LAZY RAG."—By Billy Gaston and Edgar Selden; published by Shapiro. Introduced by Billy Gaston, the American singing comedian, writer of "You'll Be Sorry Just Too Late," and many other hits. This is destined to be one of his most popular compositions. Slides by the Excelsior Co., contain several novelties.

"EVERY CORNER OF THE WORLD HOLDS YOU."—Words by Arthur J. Lamb; music by Felix Brandon; published by the music house of Laemmle. The lyrics tell of a sailor who, no matter in what part he is, has the vision of his girl before him. This set, too, contains some novelties.

LAST FOUR WEEKS' PRODUCTION.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"COWBOY."—Words by Bobby Heath; music by Chas. O'Donnell; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

The Vitagraph Company is producing the portrayal of "The Last of the Mohicans," by J. Fenimore Cowper. The dramatic situations and the scenic suggestions of this work is an inspiration that will lead to great results. This standard and historical story of the early settlers and the aborigines, the original native Indians, will have a value and interest which has never been seen by the present generation.

At the Pennsylvania ferry a few days ago the Vitagraph actors all made up as Indians for the picture play "Red Eagle" were mistaken by a policeman for real Indians. He edged up to the auto in which the actors were riding and whispering in the director's ear asked what tribe they belonged to. "Senecas," was the reply, and the Indians (?) began to jabber in an unknown tongue to give coloring to their manager's statement. Of course the policeman couldn't contradict them and was duly impressed.

Advance words about advance releases: "Jack Fat and Jim Slim," a Vitagraph comedy that is full of laughs and novel laugh agitations. Jack is as round as fat as Jim is long and slim; one furnishes a round of good fat laughs and the other provides a long laugh that lasts with slim chances of getting over it without a stitch in your side or a severe case of giggles for the balance of the week. "Jack Fat and Jim Slim" will let themselves loose on Dec. 2.

"The Preacher's Wife" will tell her story in a Vitagraph Life Portrayal on Dec. 3. It's a pathetic story of a young wife and a sanctimonious, overreligious old husband. He becomes a wiser, sadder and better man when his wife brings him down to earth and he tries to make life and home a Heaven instead of a torture and a place of torment.

The Vitagraph Company has just completed building a high cement block wall around and enclosing the square block of ground which the plant now occupies. The six buildings and the spacious yard makes the Vitagraph the largest institution of the kind in the world.

Corinth, Tenn., is to have a brand new photoplay theatre. W. A. Ament, proprietor of the Elite photoplay house, Jackson, will be the managing owner.

The Belvidere Opera House, Belvidere, N. J., has been leased and will be used for motion pictures.

ROMANCE ON THE LAZY K

It takes a LUBIN to beat a LUBIN, and this LUBIN is one of the LUBIN beaters. It's a classy little story, told by some of the best of the LUBIN comedy players, almost entirely in beautiful woodland settings, with a speed and finish that will delight you. It's a dashing little story of four hearts sadly mismated, for the girls are engaged to the wrong fellows, or vice versa, as you prefer. It looks as if they might have a time of it getting things straight, but they did it through the medium of a mock duel that gives one of the funniest finishes to a film that has been seen in a long time. Don't miss this if you want to stay friends with your patrons.

The LUBIN (bell trade mark) is the sure sign of a success

Released Monday, November 28th Length about 990 feet.

SHADOWS AND SUNSHINE

Another story that doesn't remind you of anything you've seen before. The old clerk, driven from the post he had held for twenty years, in favor of the proprietor's nephew, seeks relief from the shadows of poverty, but the act of self-destruction leads not to eternity, but to the golden land of the sunshine of prosperity. You'll like this yourself, and so will the people who pay to come in.

MOTION PICTURES IN TUBERCULOSIS FIGHT

"The Red Cross Seal" by Edison Players to Assist the American Red Cross and National Association for the Prevention and Cure of Tuberculosis — An Entertaining and Instructive Picture

THAT motion pictures should play an important part in the great educational movements of the day is but natural. Up to now nothing has been discovered that wields so potent an influence over the indifferent classes and the unthinking masses as the lifelike portrayal such as is possible through the agency of the motion picture. To see is to believe. To say that such and such is the case lacks the quality of conviction that is possessed by the actual demonstration of the fact.

Heretofore, it has been impossible to make a general, far-reaching demonstration of conditions to be corrected, but with the motion picture, portraying things as they are, and displaying them throughout the length and breadth of the land simultaneously, great impetus is given to a definite movement of reform.

We have had the "Fly Picture," which has accomplished more in one season to convince the public of the dangers of the common house fly than have the reams of printed arguments circulated in that crusade. Then came the "Milk Picture," which is performing wonders in educating the public to the necessity of a pure-milk supply. Now comes the "White Plague Picture," the latest of the line, which is destined to be equally effective in the fight against disease.

This picture, which will be known as "The Red Cross Seal," was made by the Edison Manufacturing Company, with the co-operation of the National Association for the Prevention and Cure of Tuberculosis and the American National Red Cross. The scenes depict actual conditions as they exist in the congested tenement districts of New York, and which occur in all cities. To give interest beyond the educational feature, the Edison players have woven a love story into the warp and woof of the fabric, producing a picture at once entertaining and instructive.

SCENE IN CHERRY STREET TENEMENT.

The story begins with a young woman who desires a training in art. She seeks admission to an art school, only to discover that she must pay a fee of $100 in advance. Not having the money, she sets about to earn it. Her home is in a Cherry Street tenement house—probably the worst in New York. Leaving her address with the secretary of the school, she goes away with the determination to get the money, and she is next seen doing art work in her humble lodgings.

On the occasion of her visit to the art school a young millionaire observed her presence and afterward picked up the slip of paper on which her address was written, slipping it into his vest pocket. To him life was somewhat of a bore; he had no occupation—needed none, as he was well supplied with money. In the course of events he receives a letter from the Red Cross asking for funds to prosecute its work, and also propounding the question, "Do you know how the other half lives?"

While this thought is in the young man's mind he discovers the forgotten address of the young woman whom he saw at the art school, and determines to find out how she lives, at least. Adopting a suitable disguise, he goes to the Cherry Street address for lodgings, and there discovers the young woman. He also discovers the awful conditions under which human beings exist in the old tenements. These harrowing details have been faithfully reproduced in the picture.

RED CROSS NURSE DIRECTING THE "CLEAN-UP."

In one squalid room a poor woman and several children are housed. The oldest son has tuberculosis in the first stage. His condition is serious, and a doctor has informed the mother that he will die if not taken to better surroundings.

In the meantime the young woman has won

CASUAL COMMENT

WHO would have thought that an innocent little yarn like that paragraph about the Ox and the Frog, printed in The Film Index of November 19, would have created such a commotion in the editorial menagerie of our esteemed contemporary, the Moving Picture World? We simply "shot an arrow in the air" and the pesky thing made "a palpable hit."

One of the editors of the aforesaid esteemed contemporary confesses that he has a headache. "J'ai Mal de Tete" are his words which, we suppose, is a sort of Briticised-French for what he meant to write. The other, though he does not admit it in so many words, is probably suffering from a "Mal'" of the other end, together with a severe pain in the pocketbook; all of which is very distressing to note.

After reading the protestations of our esteemed and learned brothers of the pen, we are tempted to recite that other fable entitled "The Fox and the Grapes," but we fear that awful effect.

SPEAKING of protestations reminds us to observe that the editor of the M. P. World doth protest too much. Someone has said "assume a virtue if you have it not." The World assumes the mantle of "independence" and boldly proclaims its fearlessness. Words, mere words. We are constrained to exclaim: O, Independence; how many crimes are committed in thy name.

(Rather clever adaptation, that. Eh, what!)

But what is the truth?

Without fear of contradiction we say it: THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD IS NOT INDEPENDENT, AND NEVER WAS.

From its very inception it has been a truckling, time-serving sheet; mercenary to the last degree. For sale to anyone with the price of an advertisement—not even that, but to those who looked as if they had the price; for it has not always received its blood money.

For proof of its mercenary character one has but to turn to its pages. Has there been a single venture in the field of motion pictures, good or bad, which the Moving Picture World has not openly endorsed and secretly aided and abetted for a price or a promise?

Will somebody name one.

It has mattered not if the project was an apparent detriment to the business at large, all was grist that came to the mill of the M. P. World.

Everyone remembers the "Film Import and Trading Company" and the columns of praise which the M. P. World printed about it. To-day the M. P. World admits it was a "purely financial scheme without any solid basis of business operations."

When that concern was formed the World said it was a good thing and had come in time to save the picture business from certain chaos. Then it was giving the World double page ads. To-day it is dead and forgotten; it can't hit back, so the M. P. World fearlessly, even bravely, belabors its senseless corpse.

AS FOR The Film Index, it makes no apologies. Everybody knows where it stands and what it stands for—the best there is in motion pictures in America. As for the status of the dominant interests in the picture business of America the decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals has established that beyond question.

The Patents Company and the General Film Company will try to worry along without the support of the M. P. World, seeing that the latter does not like them.

HONESTLY, though, it's tough. After you have been permitted for a year or two to get away with the idea that you were the last word, the ultimate whisper, in the picture business, and then to be suddenly dropped from your exalted seat in the band wagon to the hard pavement with a hard bump—wouldn't it make you mad?

ANOTHER blow has been struck at the "Liberty and Independence" of this free country. A gang of alleged stock jobbers, trading under the name of Burr Brothers, have been rounded up by the U. S. Post Office authorities, upon the charge of using the U. S. mails to defraud.

The Film Index takes notice of this event for the reason that this particular concern, Burr Brothers, is the firm that jobbed the stock of the now defunct "Iconograph"" or Vitack Company, a sort of motion picture toy device capitalized at $1,000,000. Thousands of innocent and ignorant people were persuaded to buy this stock upon the argument that the public was so crazy about motion pictures that the "Iconograph" would be sold in every home in the land and enormous profits would accrue thereby. Nothing like that happened and what is left of the company is now in the hands of a receiver.

ANOTHER reason The Film Index has for directing attention to the Burr Brothers case is that another company has been formed with a million dollars capital to sell stock to the innocent and ignorant public upon practically the same plea that Burr Brothers made for the "Iconograph."

The Film Index regrets that its circulation is not world wide instead of being limited to the motion picture trade, that the public might be warned against this latest stock jobbing scheme. However, there is this hope that the disclosures of the Post Office authorities in the Burr case will have the effect of warning the public against all stock jobbing schemes of whatever nature or origin.

It may be safely proclaimed that there is no stock for sale to the public on the subscription plan by any legitimate motion picture business enterprise, and that the million dollar South Dakota corporation will not be able to show a million dollars in assets in a million years. Let the public be warned.

SPEAKING about this "land of liberty and independence." Isn't it singular that there should exist a class of individuals who are always kicking against the institutions of this Republic?

The anarchists, the "blackhanders," and the criminal classes and irresponsibles collectively, are always telling us that this is not a "free country." Fortunately the majority of the citizens of this Republic are able to discriminate between the terms "liberty" and "license"; fortunately they do not sympathize with the "bomb thrower," the kidnapper and the murderer, or with the violator of property rights, whether he be a common pickpocket or an infringer of a patent.

Therefore, we surmise that violators of the protective laws of this Republic will continue to be in constant danger of punishment for some time to come.

"WHOM the gods would destroy they first make mad." If that saying possesses any virtue then it must be concluded that our greatly esteemed contemporary has been marked by the gods for destruction, for it surely is as "mad as a hatter," and we'd have you to know that that's very, very mad.

Evidence that the above statement is true may be found on almost any page of last week's issue of our aforesaid "esteemed." Its double-headed editorial staff fairly fumes and froths in its outburst against "trusts" and sich. One of it attempted to tackle the legal aspect of the situation relating to the Motion Picture Patents Company's charter and its agreement with the licensed manufacturers. He goes on to mumble about court of appeals and agreements, says that something is "ultra vires," just like a person talking in his sleep, and about as senseless. Clearly the situation has addled his brain.

As an act of professional courtesy the editor of The Film Index feels in duty bound to come to the assistance of the editor of the "esteemed" (the one with the alphabetical appendage) and explain to him that the whole thing is a joke—a Yankee joke, which is the reason why he never can understand it, and never will know why.

PICTURE OPERATORS DINE OFFICERS

John J. Barry, of Boston, president of the International Alliance Theatrical Stage Employes of United States and Canada, and Lee M. Hart, of Chicago, secretary of the organization, who were delegates of the American Federation of Labor, which met last week in St. Louis, Mo., were also the guests of honor at a dinner given by the Local No. 143 Motion Picture Operators of that city.

The dinner came to the president and secretary of the association as a big surprise, and was one of the big events of the trip. The local operators saw that their guests should be entertained in the most hospitable manner, and the speeches delivered by Messrs. Barry and Hart assured Local 143 that they felt highly honored by being the guests of such an organization.

California, the Motion Picture Paradise

Land of Perpetual Sunshine. It Becomes the Mecca of All Picture Men

SUNSHINE. and lots of it, is the one great requirement for good motion picture photography. Artificial light may be used with good effect and in some scenes it is absolutely necessary to secure the effects desired; but after all "Old Sol" is still pre-eminent for photographic purposes, which is the reason for the present general exodus of motion picture makers to the land of perpetual sunshine—Southern California.

According to the statistics of the United States Weather Bureau there are more days of unbroken sunlight in that part of the United States, of which Los Angeles, California, is the commercial center, than in any other region. Not only that, but the climate is most salubrious in those parts in other respects. As most of the great picture makers of America have their headquarters and studios in the North, they have found it necessary to send companies of artists and cameramen hither and thither during the winter season in search of proper climatic conditions in order to keep up with the demand for pictures. Much work of this sort has been done in the South, and two companies (Kalem and Selig) now have picture artists in Florida. But the experience of others has proved that Southern California affords the most ideal conditions, so the movement toward that region has become general.

The first company to demonstrate the advantages of the land of sunshine was the Biograph Company, whose forces spent last season near Los Angeles with excellent results, and which is now reported to be making arrangements for permanent studios in that city with a view to keeping a company of players there during the greater part of the year.

Following the example of the Biograph Company, the Selig Polyscope Company and the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company secured locations in California. The former located near Los Angeles, leasing the buildings and grounds of a once famous Spanish mission. The Essanay Company located its base of operations at San Jose, a little further north, and in the mountain region, but nevertheless admirably adapted for the purpose of the motion picture man.

Within the past few weeks steps have been taken by the Pathe Company, the Kalem Company and the Lubin Company to establish themselves in or near Los Angeles, so that before another month has passed the motion picture colony at Los Angeles will have assumed considerable proportions, giving that city the distinction of being the principal center of the picture producing industry after New York and Chicago. Studios will be built for the staging of such scenes as call for interior treatment, and the equipmentf or developing negative and printing positive film will be installed. The principal work of manufacture will still be performed in the main studios of the several companies.

The plans of the Kalem Company contemplate the construction of an equipment similar to that installed on the Kalem "Indian Farm" in Jersey, specially adapted to the taking of Indian pictures. William Wright, of the Kalem Company, has been in Los Angeles for the past week looking over the territory and selecting a suitable location for the company's operations. It is the intention of the Kalem company to lease a large tract of land about twenty miles from Los Angeles and to engage a number of expert horsemen to strengthen the regular stock company of players which is now on its way to Los Angeles. The company will be under the direction of Producer Kenean Buell.

The plans of the Lubin and the Pathe companies have not assumed definite shape as yet, but arrangements are being made by both concerns for the production of pictures at Los Angeles in the near future.

The operations of the Essanay Company at San Jose were the subject of an interesting story published in The Film Index some time ago. One of the features of that company's field equipment is a specially designed railway car fitted for the handling of negative or positive film; in fact, it is almost a manufacturing plant on wheels. An engraving from a photograph of this car is published herewith.

G. Melies, as has been announced, has found an ideal location for winter operations near San Antonio, Texas, where his company of players are already on the ground and hard at work producing pictures. There is lots of sunshine in Texas and the atmosphere is productive of splendid photographic results.

There remains to be heard from only the Vitagraph Company. Its plans for the winter season has not yet been announced, but it has been hinted that extensive operations in the South are in contemplation, and that the big motor yachts owned by Messrs. Blackton and Smith will be pressed into service. But whatever those plans are it may be taken for granted that something of a most interesting character will be evolved.

Operations as extensive as those undertaken by the several manufacturers of licensed pictures warrant the statement that the coming product will be of the greatest interest to the public. Exhibitors have come to realize that there will be no falling off in the quality and interest in pictures made under licensed auspices and those who hope for any degree of permanency have secured licensed service and are sticking to it. High class and dependability are the two principal requisites for success, and the licensed manufacturers are leaving no stone unturned to insure the continuance of those conditions.

TWENTIETH CENTURY CLUB HEARS STORY

National Board of Censorship Secretary Tells of Child Recreation on Motion Pictures

The Twentieth Century Club of Richmond Hill, Staten Island, N. Y., had for speaker at its combined programme and business meeting Nov. 14, Walter Story, secretary of the National Board of Censorship. His theme was "Child Recreation in Moving Picture Shows." There are 500 of these shows in Manhattan, with a half-million attendance, on an average. From 40 to 45 new subjects are put on every week. From 20 to 25 per cent. of the audience is made up of children. It is a rapid way of educating the foreign element among us.

The censorship board works under the Federation of Women's Clubs, the National Y. M. C. A. and other societies. It meets four days a week. In conducting the shows, the picture show management must observe the child law; must maintain proper order, respect the fire laws and ventilate properly. The manager of a show is simply a business man supplying material to his audience, as to the trade. The manufacturer is extremely sensitive to attacks on his outfit or way of conducting his show. He says: "We want to be known as respectable, because we are so."

OGDEN HOUSE ADDS ORCHESTRA.

The managebent of the Ogden Photoplay House, Ogden City, Utah, always alert to any improvement in the quality of their entertainment, have added three more instruments to the orchestra at the Globe Theatre, making it, under the able leadership of Miss Lillian Thatcher, one of the finest musical organizations in the city.

This new move is in line with the established policy of the company to give to the public the very best of musical and photoplay amusement that their liberal patronage makes practicable, and incidentally gives good employment to three more of Ogden's musicians.

This added expense of increased music will in no way detract from the quality of the pictures presented, and the same high standard of the past will be maintained.

"A SIMPLE RUSTIC TALE"

A Delightful Subject by Gaumont.

JAS. S. McQUADE

I MUST confess that as the weeks and months past the Gaumont product makes a constantly growing appeal to me. And this statement is made in an altogether unprejudiced state of mind, and is based on whatever critical knowledge of pictures I may possess, however circumscribed that may be.

While I think Gaumont turns out too many scriptural subjects, I must at the same time compliment the firm on the magnificent efforts made in that line. The great wealth of costumes and scenery displayed, and the stately pomp and pageantry of long by-gone days revealed in many of the films, fairly dazzle the eye and compel one to reflect on the scholarly study and ripe knowledge required to produce them.

SCENE FROM GAUMONT'S "A SIMPLE RUSTIC TALE."

The fine photography so uniformly shown in the Gaumont films is worthy of all praise. Indeed, it affects the eye much in the same way that sweet music does the ear, or as the harmonious flow of inspired poetry delights the mind. There is clearness without glare, and there are depth and shade contrasts without gloom. Moreover, there is a stereoscopic quality about the Gaumont product that makes one almost believe that he is viewing solid forms and objects instead of their reflection.

SCENE FROM GAUMONT'S "A SIMPLE RUSTIC TALE."

In "A Simple Rustic Tale," which I viewed in George Kleine's private exhibition room last week, I can promise, without any fear of disappointment, a delicious treat for picture lovers. The story is compelling, the photography excellent and the acting finished. I cannot remember when I have seen another film run off that offered such finished character acting as is to be found in the filmed scenes of this bucolic story. And the costumes and surroundings are all there, in perfect harmony with the characters.

The story is laid in France—in Brittany, I believe—and the scenes are both picturesque and instructive, portraying, as they do, rural life in that country. Dupont and Durand, two farmers, are near neighbors. The one has an only son, the other an only daughter, and the young people are engaged for marriage. It is nutting time, and while the lovers spend their Sundays in the woods, their fathers are playing cards and their mothers are chatting and gossiping.

SCENE FROM GAUMONT'S "A SIMPLE RUSTIC TALE."

We see the Dupont family making a call on neighbor Durand, and watch with interest the meeting of the lovers. The latter soon leave the old folks to themselves, and while the women engage in conversation, the men are seen playing a game of cards. It is evidently a well contested game, for both men are deeply absorbed in the issue. Suddenly Dupont jumps to his feet and seizes the cards in Durand's hand. Counting them he shows that Durand holds one card too many, and then, shaking his fist angrily in his neighbor's face, he calls him a cheat and a knave and rushes from the room.

The old ladies, happy in their cronying, are dismayed by the appearance on the scene of the angry Dupont, who, unceremoniously orders his wife to accompany him home and to sever friendly connections with the Durand family. Then he goes off to find the lovers, and interrupts their blissful reveries by a raucous command to his son to leave his sweetheart forever. And we see the timid youth shrink before his father and leave his promised bride to weep over the blight that has come to her happiness.

But the lovers are not so easily parted. There are midnight and other meetings at which they re-pledge themselves. Durand discovers them during one of these clandestine love feasts and gruffly bids young Dupont to be off, while he raises his hand threateningly to his daughter as he orders her home. Love, however, still continues to find a way and places for meeting until the climax comes. That arrives when young Dupont comes home late one night, and his father, suspecting the cause, refuses him admittance and commands him to leave.

The lovers, however, are not friendless, for they have in their mothers staunch allies. Mother Durand has a ready wit and, knowing her husband better than he knows himself, she plans to bring reconciliation between the families. She counsels her son to disappear, and arranges a hiding place for him in an unused building on the farm, where she supplies him with food. One other knows of the youth's whereabouts, and that is his sweetheart.

Now we see the elder Dupont moving around his farm, and noting here and there evidences of the work of his banished son. And we see the gnawing at his heart by the pained and sad expression on his face as he thinks of his absent boy. His melancholy grows daily, and although he is too proud to confess his condition to his wife, that knowing woman sees and understands just as well as he.

One day he sits forlornly in the barnyard, deeply lost in thought, when his old neighbor Durand passes. The latter sympathizes with the sorrow of his old friend, but hesitates to let his presence be known. His better nature finally prevails and he offers his hand in friendship. The two men immediately become reconciled, and they are soon joined by the wives and children, all beaming with the joy of great happiness.

Ths final scene is notable both for photography and easy, natural posing.

GOOD AMERICAN PATHES

A Domestic Problem and a Roaring Farce Comedy Big Spectacular Coming

"HER FIRST HUSBAND'S RETURN" is the title of a domestic drama by the Pathe American Company that possesses the quality of gripping interest throughout. It is a picture portrayal of one of those events of life that sometimes happen and form real tragedies. In this picture story the woman has married a second time. Her husband is called away on business and has bid an affectionate goodby. Just as he leaves, a rather disreputable looking man saunters up to the house. He recognizes the woman and walks in to startle her with his unannounced presence. When he has proved to her that he is the husband whom she thought had been killed in a railroad wreck several years before, the woman is greatly disturbed and consents to pay him the money demanded for his silence, upon which he leaves the house. During the night a burglar breaks into the place, and while he is in search for valuables, the first husband again returns. The burglar conceals himself just before the woman and her first husband enter the room. The man has secured the marriage certificate and threatens to reveal the situation to the second husband. A quarrel ensues, in which the burglar takes a hand to protect the woman. In the mixup, that ensues, the woman secures the revolver which her former husband has produced and holds up both the ex-husband and the burglar, compelling the first husband to produce the marriage certificate and the burglar to touch a match to it. Then she permits the burglar to escape, while she calls the police and hands over her ex-husband as the burglar. The second husband returns in time to catch her as she falls fainting from the effects of excitement. The plot is quite sensational and the acting is very effective.

The Animated Arm Chair.

In the way of a farce comedy the "Animated Arm Chair" by the Pathe American Company is sure to be a great laugh producer. The trouble arises over the fact that a girl's mother has forbidden her seeing a young fellow to whom she is very much attached. Taking a desperate chance, she invites the young man to her home at a time when her mother is away. The young folks are very much interested in themselves when the mother unexpectedly returns. There seems to be no escape for the boy and what to do is a problem. It is solved by throwing a chair cover over his head and compelling him to pose as an arm chair.

The girl manages to keep the mother away from this particular chair, but more visitors arrive and one finally sits down on the chair. As the woman is very large the chair objects to the burden and something happens that throws the company into terrible commotion. In fact, they are so badly frightened that they all run from the house. This is the young man's opportunity, and he escapes from the window while the women are holding a session outdoors. He comes sauntering down the street and is requested to go into the house and see what a terrible creature has taken possession. This is his chance and in his own way he disposes of the supposed intruder and becomes the hero of the occasion. When you see it in the film, you will appreciate the fact that "love will find a way."

A COMING SPECTACULAR PATHE PRODUCTION

Pathe Freres will release on Friday, Dec. 16th, a magnificent production of Little Snowdrop, adapted from Grimm's well-know fairy tale, "The Magic Mirror." This picture is one of those spectacular productions for which the house of Pathe is so famous.

Cheap cynicism boldly asserts that the modern child has no love for fairy tales, but cheap cynicism is a negative quantity when children are concerned, and it is solid rock-bottom fact that young and old love fairy tales just as much as they did in the dead and gone days. Their prime favorites, too, are the old-fashioned ones, and everyone who sees the title of Little Snowdrop appear on the screen, will clap their hands with delight, knowing full well what wonderful things must be in store for them. Nor will they be mistaken, for in this play are knights in glittering armor, gaily bedecked horses, fine ladies, dwarfs, and in a word, all the pageantry of fairy lore. All these wonderful beings and things are part and parcel of a splendid whole, over which a consummate knowledge of stage craft has cast its magic. Never have properties been more elaborate, never has scenery been more carefully worked up, and never has a palace looked more real than King Othon's palace. For months the film has been in preparation, but the cast and the trouble expended upon it have been well repaid.

The picture is also most gorgeously colored. The tale of Little Snowdrop and the Seven Dwarfs is so well known that it would be superfluous to repeat it here.

It is a long time since Pathe offered a treat like this, and we venture to say that this great spectacular production is sure to make a big hit wherever shown.

NEW HOUSE FOR FLATBUSH

Modern Photoplay Theater Will Be Erected on Caton Avenue—Will Also Give High Class Vaudeville

The old buildings on the easterly side of Flatbush avenue, nearly opposite Carlton avenue, Flatbush, Long Island, are being torn down to make way for another theatre. They are in the middle of the block between Linden avenue and Lenox road. The lease of the site, as filed in the Register's Office in the Hall of Records, shows that the property is to be used for the erection of a photoplay and vaudeville theatre. The site is 75x130 feet. The structure is to be put up by the Carlton Amusement Company, and will have a seating capacity of about 1,000 persons.

The management of the place will be in the hands of A. H. Schwartz, owner of the Washington Theatre, at 344 Fifth avenue and the head of the Carlton company. The structure will be of fire-proof construction and fitted with modern equipment. Mr. Schwartz says that although the nature of the entertainments has not been fully determined, it is contemplated to give vaudeville performances at moderate prices in addition to the latest motion pictures. The office of the Star and Crescent Realty Company was formerly on the site to be occupied by the new structure.

ARRESTED FOR ALLOWING WOMEN TO WEAR HATS.

There has been a great deal of newspaper talk about managers of photoplay theatres being arrested for having dark houses and allowing children under age to be admitted to their houses unaccompanied by their parents, but when it comes to arresting a manager for allowing women to wear their hats during a performance, that is certainly upholding a city ordinance to the letter.

Well, that is what happened last week to Charles Klopot, of the Star photoplay theatre, Youngstown, Ohio. Although Mr. Klopot is a practical stranger in Youngstown, and did not know of such an ordinance, he pleaded guilty, and stated he was glad that such a law was enforced. The fine, which was $2, was suspended by the judge, and Mr. Klopot promised that he would see that the ordinance in his house would be strictly observed in the future.

NEW DREAMLAND THEATRE OPENS

Bellows Falls Latest Photoplay Theatre Welcomes Large Crowds—Best Pictures Used.

The newest theatre in Bellows Falls, Vt.—the Dreamland—on Rockingham street, was opened to the public on Monday afternoon, Nov. 21.

For the past eight weeks workmen were busy on the new structure, which is of concreted blocks, the only building of its kind in town, and they have transformed it into a thing of artistic beauty, a cosy and well arranged theatre with a seating capacity of 325. About $5,500 has been spent in the construction and decorations. The policy of the house will be motion pictures and vaudeville.

The theatre is well heated by three wall radiators of 6 sections each, on both sides of the building. The system of ventilation is the latest and best devised. The interior is charming. The ceiling is painted in dark green, with a brown border and Indian red trimming. The stage is 20 feet deep, and has a 20-foot opening, with a drop curtain. The scenery is pretty and in good taste. There are two drop scenes, a parlor and street view. There is a dressing room on each side, and there are eight footlights and eight border lights on stage. The seats are larger than those ordinarily used in most theatres, the space between each row being 28 inches. The seats are of rockwood, with iron bases, and are set in concrete. The house is spacious, the height being 20 to 14 feet high, with a pitch of 1½ inches to the foot so that the stage may be clearly seen from every seat. There are four exits, two of which are fire exits, and are indicated by red lettered boxes. The moving picture machine is placed over the ticket office, and is in an asbestos booth. The screens for the pictures will be 12x14 feet. All doors swing outward.

From the outside the theatre is also attractive. An electric piano is on the left of the entrance and the ticket office is in the center. The lobby is finished in lght blue, cream and Indian red, and is 16 feet wide. Two big arcs give a full glare to the street, and the name of the theatre is cut in concrete above the entrance, and on the lobby is the name in brass letters. The front exterior is 22 feet high, and is a clean and attractive structure. The manager is Thomas H. Kiniry, who was so successful in old Dreamland.

THE STORY OF MOLLY FINNEY

Romance of Colonial Days Pictured by the Kalem Players

IN the early Colonial days, to be exact, in the year 1756—the depredations of the Indians were of common occurrence and many harrowing tales have come down through history of the hardships, privations and suffering of the white settlers at the hands of the cruel redskins. Prominent among these stories is that of "Molly Finney," a beautiful young girl living with the family of Thomas Means, at Flying Point, on the coast of Maine. The Kalem players have taken this tale and built about it a very interesting picture story, quite romantic in detail.

According to the tale, Molly Finney was stolen from the cabin of Thomas Means, by the Indians, who took her to the settlement of Quebec and there sold her as a servant to one of the wealthy families of the town. Years afterwards she was rescued and restored to her people. The picture version has it that Captain William McLellan, of the brig "Rose," was in love with Molly before her abduction. While being carried away by the Indians the girl managed to make known her destination by writing on a piece of birch bark which she throws in the water. This message is found by Captain McLellan and causes him to set out upon the search for his missing sweetheart. In his ship he sails to Quebec and there eventually effects a rescue under very dramatic circumstances.

In the picture scenic effects have been well chosen. The ship used might well have been a relic of bygone centuries. The costuming and the interior settings suggest Colonial days, and if the Molly Finney of the actual event was half as pretty as the sweet-faced girl who impersonated her in the Kalem picture, it is no wonder that Captain McLellan went to unusual lengths to accomplish her rescue. The concluding scene of the picture is a melodramatic climax that is most effective.

CHURCH WILL CONTINUE PICTURES.

At a meeting of the members of the Holy Name society, of the Church of the Blessed Sacrament, Newark, N. J., last week, it was decided to continue the photoplay theatre, in the hall on Clinton avenue for the public, the fund accruing from the sale of tickets to go to the church fund.

A new picture machine is to be purchased and the hall will be open Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday nights of every week. On Sunday afternoons pictures of sacred subjects will be shown. This entertainment will be for the children and members of the Sunday School.

NEW HOUSE AT REDLANDS OPENS.

On November 25 the new photoplay and vaudeville house at the corner of Stuart avenue and Orange street, Redlands, Cal., was opened to the public. The theatre is built on modern lines, being modeled after several of the big motion picture houses in Los Angeles. A heating and ventilation system has been installed. This contract calls for an expenditure of about $1,500. The lease for the building was signed Nov. 19 by H. B. Penoyer and C. K. Percy, of San Pedro, who are back of the project. Earlier in the season Scott & Cook intended assuming the management of the new place, but it is understood they dropped negotiations only recently.

It is planned by the lessees to give a motion picture performance and to introduce a vaudeville stunt at each performance. The house seats 600 persons.

ALL-FRENCH PICTURE THEATRE

Ed. M. Mairot opened a photoplay theatre at 368 Seventh avenue, New York, last June. This is in the French quarter and M. Mairot is endeavoring to cater to his compatriots. His theatre, which is tastefully decorated, seats 200, and it is his intention from now on to cut out illustrated songs and give only French songs sung by a good French vocalist. Needless to say, M. Mairot uses a Pathe professional model and is always hammering at his exchange for all the Pathe subjects he can obtain. In addition all the stores for several blocks around are kept supplied with window cards in French announcing that Pathe films are featured at this theatre. Mme. Mairot ably assists her husband at the ticket window.

FAIRY PHOTOPLAY THEATRE REMODELED.

Since the Fairy photoplay threatre, Ft. Wayne, Ind., has been remodeled, business has been increasing every week. On the opening night, Manager J. P. Mollett had to hang the S. R. O. sign out early in the evening.

The Fairy is one of the pioneer houses in Ft. Wayne, and always been looked upon as one of the elite theatres of its kind in that city. When they first opened, there were but 108 seats, but now it comfortably holds 300 persons.

By James S McQuade

I WAS favored with a long and interesting conversation the other day by Mr. B. Nichols of London, England, who spent a few days here last week on business. Mr. Nichols is the agent for the products of a number of licensed American manufacturers, his territory embracing Europe, Australasia, Africa, Asia and South America. He makes headquarters in London and he has branch offices in all the European capitals. Mr. Nichols' visit to Chicago was made chiefly for the purpose of consulting with Mr. Wm. N. Selig, whose product is handled by him in all the countries mentioned.

As Mr. Nichols is traveling most of the time, in Europe especially, and always in the interests of the motion picture industry, it is only natural to expect that a man of his keen observation and thorough knowledge of the business would possess a store of valuable information. And this opinion was delightfully confirmed.

What impressed me particularly during the conversation was the enthusiastic and confident manner in which Mr. Nichols viewed the drawing power of the motion picture. And he was specially strong in advocating the exhibition of pictures by themselves, without the use of illustrated song, or high class singing numbers, or vaudeville. A grand piano and an organ, with first class players of these instruments, are the only requisites necessary, Mr. Nichols thinks for a theatre seating 500 to 700 people; but he is emphatic in declaring that every picture should have its appropriate music played while the film is being run. For larger theatres Mr. Nichols favors a well selected orchestra of seven or more pieces; but pictures must form the main feature and not be subordinated either to instrumental or vocal music.

In connection with appropriate music being selected for each picture, Mr. Nichols showed me a film calendar gotten out by his London firm, showing the releases for November, 1910. The title of the film appears with the trade mark of the maker and the release date, all in the same line. Then underneath the title is given the name of the musical selection to be plays while the film is run off. For example: "Dora Thorne," a Selig film, is given the music "Rose Leaves" (entr'acte). "If I Had the World to Give You" and dramatic music.

The film calendar is gotten out just as early as possible each month and is mailed to exhibitors so that they can secure the music from the publishers, or music stores, in time, care being taken to select such music as can be readily purchased from publishers or dealers. Mr. Nichols states that these approved musical selections are made by an expert who is engaged specially for the purpose. The expert sees the film subject run off and immediately fixes in his mind the appropriate music. From the London office these film calendars are mailed to exhibitors in all parts of Great Britain and Ireland. Similar calendars are issued in all the European capitals. This assuredly shows praiseworthy and encouraging progress and should be imitated in this country. The music sheets, I forgot to state, cost the exhibitors sixpence each, about 12 cents.

The London picture theatres have all been specially built for pictures and the shabby, small theatre has disappeared. Picture theatres in that city at present cost all the way from $20,000 to $75,000, and companies and capitalists are investing largely in such structures. One of these larger theatres, mentioned by Mr. Nichols, pays as high as 5 per cent. per month, or 60 per cent. per year on the capital invested; so that in less than two years the house will have paid for itself.

Where can our American capitalists de better than by investing in high-class picture theatres?

Mr. Nichols made one remark that sunk deep in my mind. It was this: "The moving picture theatre can better afford to pay high lease rent than any other business." Of course he meant a high-class modern house with a seating capacity of 1,000 or over. London has proved this; for fine picture theatres can be found on such public thoroughfares as Oxford and Regent streets. And the admission prices are sixpence and a shilling—12 cents and 24 cents.

The interiors of these modern London picture theatres are models of art and comfort. No expense has been spared to please the eye and to administer to the pleasure of patrons. Refinement and luxury are apparent on every hand and cheap effects are wholly lacking. In keeping with the surroundings, ladies and men—many of them—can be seen in immaculate evening dress. This suffices to show that a picture theatre of the right type will attract the most cultured patronage, and even the vulgarly inclined are forced to a higher ethical plane by such surroundings. Moving pictures are slowly but surely coming into their own.

Germany is about one year and a half behind England in the picture business; that is, in the type of theatres, quality of the shows and in the class of the audiences. But progress is being made, so Mr. Nichols informs me.

In Italy, the State and municipalities are establishing a strict censorship of film, and the vicious type of film subjects is being gradually forced from the market.

Fine picture theatres are to be found in St. Petersburgh and Moscow; but Russia, as yet, is in a very backward state. In Holland, Belgium, Denmark and the Scandinavian peninsula. pictures are popular and are steadily growing in favor. France does not do herself credit by her picture theatre system; but the near future promises better things.

The product of the American licensed manufacturers is in high demand in Great Britain and Ireland and on the Continent. Australia and Africa, too, hold it in high esteem.

Mr. Nichols told me an amusing story about the fate of the Imp film in the United Kingdom. Prior to the arrival of the first releases Laemmle painted things in the most lurid red by advance advertising. Exhibitors judged that "the greatest ever" was about to be sprung on them, and orders poured in to renting establishments for the first Imp releases, at a lively and unprecedented rate. The bubble burst on the showing of the first prints, and every exhibitor, who had swallowed the Laemmle advertisements and his booming of the great Miss Lawrence, wired to the renters the two words, "Never again." Critical opinion in "the tight little isle" was stronger than the Laemmle advertising and Imp film has become a memory there.

Mr. Nichols left for Philadelphia on Monday, Nov. 21, where he will call on Mr. Lubin, and thence will proceed to New York, en route for London.

Chicago Schools Will Show Pictures.

The Chicago Board of Education has decided to open eight school "centers" in about a fortnight, the final details being arranged by the members Tuesday, Nov. 22. These "centers" which will be open three nights a week will exhibit the best class of moving pictures, according to the statement of John D. Shoop, assistant superintendent of schools. Large phonographs will also be installed and patriotic songs and other music will be rendered. There will also be gymnasium and singing classes, illustrated lectures, debates and lyceum programs.

The nickel theatres will feel the effects of the new departure in a sense; but as the "centers" are open at nights and for only three at that, it is not expected that any appreciable loss of patronage will be experienced.

The "Policy" That Waned.

One has to smile at the attempt of the editor of the "Moving Picture World," in the issue of Nov. 26, to explain the "apparently contradictory opinions" of that publication about a certain picture, the said "apparently contradictory opinions" having been paralleled by me in my letter in The Film Index of Nov. 19.

Intelligent readers know the difference between "apparently contradictory" and "contradictory," and the quoted paragraphs speak for themselves.

I thank the editor of the "Moving Picture World" for reminding me that "to speak the truth without fear or favor" was one of the planks of the original policy of that paper. How has that pledge been fulfilled in my own case? Writing about my humble self the editor states:

"He has to do what he is told; write what he is told; think what he is told, all of which explains his remarks in the issue of his house organ for November 19," every statement of which is a falsehood, and the willful product of an envenomed mind.

Get back on your fence, Mr. Editor, or you will lose that accustomed crease in the seat of your nether garment. I forgive you for the lapse from your boasted "policy," because nobody who knows me will believe you. But I can scarcely forgive you for belittling a noble stanza by associating it with the spirit of your article. It is so touching to dabble in the verse of the famous author of "Gulistan," after one has attempted to cut a neighbor's throat!

The Saxe Enterprises.

It gave me considerable pleasure to meet Thomas Saxe, of the Saxe Amusement Co., of Milwaukee, last week, as it is due to him and his efforts that the exhibition of motion pictures has become so important a factor in the entertainment of the residents of that city.

Mr. Saxe now controls and manages six theatres in Milwaukee. Five of these—the Princess, Modjeska, Globe, Orpheum and Theatorium—use pictures only. The Crystal offers vaudeville and pictures. The Theatorium and Globe, with seating capacities of 270 and 500, respectively, charge 5 cents. The Orpheum, Princess and Modjeska, seating 450, 700 and 800 people respectively, charge 10 cents. The three last named houses have each a four-piece orchestra and a large pipe organ, the latter costing $2,200.

First runs are first exhibited in the Orpheum and Princess, down town houses, and are then used by the Modjeska and Globe, which are situated in the residence section. In these four houses strong singing numbers, consisting of character songs, with spot light, comedy duets, quartets, etc., are given. The Globe and Theatorium supplement the pictures by illustrated songs, the latter also being used at times in the other three houses. With the exceptions of the Modjeska and Globe, which are open evenings only, the picture houses run from 10 a. m. till 11 p. m.

Mr. Saxe assured me that while pictures are being run, a newspaper can be read in any of his picture theatres, a feature that has contributed greatly to their popularity and success, as well as to the advancement of picture entertainment in other houses which have followed his example. He uses either mirror screens, or others coated with aluminum, and the most approved lighting system.

Neatly uniformed girl ushers attend on patrons in the Saxe theatres. As is already well known, the interiors of the Princess and Modjeska are models of art and comfort.

Mr. Saxe is a close student of the exhibition end of the picture business, and is always eager to adopt new methods or to improve old ones, whenever such changes promise to satisfy better the desires of his patrons. While the business on Saturdays and Sundays is usually of capacity volume, Mr. Saxe thinks that better results should be given on other days than at present. However, he is showing to good paying business and believes that the future has still better things in store for the up-to-date exhibitor.

The General Film Company at 85 Dearborn street furnishes service to his circuit of houses.

Chicago Film Brevities

Mr. Schuyler Colfax, of the Eastman Co., Rochester, N. Y., was in the city for a few days last week, the guest of Wm. N. Selig.

A novelty streamer, made of waterproof paper, in two colors, has been gotten out by the Selig Company for advance advertising of the "County Fair," to be released Dec. 15. One letter of the title appears on each successive sheet of the streamer, and the whole forms an attractive and neat advertisement. Mr. Nichols, European representative, was so pleased with these streamers that he ordered 1,000 of them for use abroad.

R. W. Metcalf will open a new theatre, the name of which has not yet been decided upon, in Blandinsville, Ill., in about 10 days. He arranged for service at the General Film Co.'s office, at 85 Dearborn street, and also purchased machine and supplies.

"THE LAW AND THE MAN"

A Dramatic Vitagraph "Life Portrayal"

IF you can get away with it you're a good one. It remains to be seen that anybody can do a contemptible or dishonorable trick without being brought to account and suffer the consequences. The law and its technicalities are often sought as a means of escape but the man must be reckoned with when it comes to a question of honesty.

Peters is one kind of man, a mean avaricious, grasping and hardened in the pursuit for gain and when he tries to buy John Turton, a young lawyer, as his tool in his nefarious service he has not counted on the man, for Turton is a man of honor and integrity who, when he learns from Claire Morton that Peters is trying to swindle her father, readily rejects Peter's inducements and at Claire's request, takes her father's case in hand and throws himself heart and soul into the work.

Peters is driven to extremes and tries on the eve of the trial, with the assistance of thuggish hirelings and his unprincipled retainers, to do away with the young lawyer who has a narrow escape at their hands. Peters supposes that Turton is killed; his lawyer brings the case before the court and insists on an immediate trial of the case. Mr. Morton pleads for a postponement of the case owing to the absence of his counsel. Peters insists upon no delay and the case proceeds.

Everything seems to be going Peter's way when there is a hush in the proceedings and John Turton with head bandaged, rushes into the room and demands a hearing. He tells of the attack made upon him by the gang employed by Peters then goes on with his client's case, shows how Peters has tried to defraud Morton out of his lands and the price of his mining property, secures his conviction, comes out successfully with flying colors and winning Claire Morton's consent to marry him.

There is a dramatic stir to this picture that keeps us in a whir of delightful expectation. It has that which most pleases; the overthrow of wrong and the triumph of right. Besides, it is a phase of real life that we read about every day but very seldom see in actual performance and life as we see it in "The Law and the Man."

There is but one deduction in the objective thought in this "Life Portrayal" and that is, it pays to be honest and do right. We can draw a conclusion from this kind of production—it is the kind that has brought the Life Portrayals up to the standard of excellence which they have achieved.

SCENE FROM VITAGRAPH LIFE PORTRAYAL "THE LAW AND THE MAN."

By the Rev. William T. Russell, Pastor of St. Patrick's Catholic Church.

I am not opposed to the motion picture house in principle, but I am opposed to its abuses. It is an institution which has developed in response to a demand. Generally speaking, the chief difficulty in making it an institution for good lies in controlling this demand. It is a problem inviting thorough investigation and study, but one, I think, not incapable of solution.

In the first place, I am of the opinion that the worst feature of the motion picture theatre is its tendency to over-stimulate the appetite of the public for amusement. When people give undue attention to entertainment and form the habit of attending the motion pictures every day, the amusement becomes decidedly unhealthful.

Secondly, this accentuated desire on the part of children to attend the shows often leads to other things of a serious nature which parents find difficult to correct. I have reason to believe that in many cases children form the habit of picking up stray 5-cent pieces around the house in order to obtain the necessary price of admission to the show.

Outside of the effect on character-development, produced by the constant attendance at these shows, there is that of the effect upon the body, which is of the greatest importance. The injury to the eyes, caused by the vibration of the light rays of the motion picture machine, is a subject which has been almost criminally neglected. The eyes of adults must suffer to some extent from the effect of this strong, flickering light, but the injury to the young, developing eyes of a child may be almost incalculable. Where shows are not continually patronized the effect of the light doubtless would be slight.

As yet the institution of the photoplay house is young, and we should lose no time in studying and correcting its harmful features before they work any great injury.

There is the feature of young children being kept up late attending the performances. The physically injurious consequences of this cannot be doubted, but it is to be hoped that enlightenment in the family will eventually lead to the abolition of this feature.

As to the operation of motion picture theatres on Sunday I am decidedly opposed to this. If these places are permitted to open on Sunday why should not theatres be given the same privilege?

Sunday is a day of rest as well as a day of divine service, but for people to go into the motion picture house, where the air is frequently stuffy, when they could spend their time in the parks, means that they have a disregard of their health.

Many people with but one day out of each week for recreation, who formerly went to the parks and filled their lungs with good, healthy air, now spend their Sundays cooped up in these cheap theatres, subjecting their bodies to severe tests when they might be giving them much needed recreation.

On the grounds of conserving physical needs, alone, motion picture houses should not be permitted to operate on Sundays.

As to the methods which should be employed in correcting the abuses that have grown out of these institutions I am in favor of anything but cumbersome machinery. In fact, the simplest methods, in my opinion, will accomplish the surest and most direct results.

The police should have the censorship of the films. I cannot see that a board of censorship could accomplish anything that the police may not. The latter regulate the productions at the theatres and, so far as I know, the public has no ground for complaint concerning them. If they can control larger theatres they should be able to hold the motion picture houses in check also.

Without having given the subject much thought I should say that the chief of police could install a system whereby the police officers would report several times during the week as to the character of films being displayed in the various houses throughout the city. Whenever report should be made of a questionable film an investigation could be made immediately and a decision reached as to whether the film should be barred. I have the greatest confidence in the ability of Major Sylvester and the Police Department to properly handle the situation.

If the method should prove practicable for censoring films the problem of reducing the over-appetite of the public for motion pictures may be handled with even less difficulty. It could be done by simply allowing a limited number of motion picture houses to be established within a given area.

Just as more saloons within a given number of blocks will result in more liquor being consumed, so more amusement houses will cause more people to spend money for unhealthful recreation.

Limit the number of motion picture houses and the demand of the public for this cheap class of entertainment will gradually adjust itself upon a normal basis.

School authorities should give the problems connected with the motion picture house thorough attention, for while they safeguard the health of the children during school hours, this effect may be stultified through their failure to keep them from unlimited attendance at the amusement places where their health and morals may be seriously injured.

In fact, the whole question is one which should be carefully considered by the public, and, with the enlightenment which will result from this, supplemented by practical police supervision, we may expect the motion picture houses, operating upon safe and sane methods to become an amusement not injurious to the public.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Christmas is coming and it is well to know what you are going to give your people at that season. You want to give them something that has the Christmas flavor of peace and good will toward men. Your good will is worth something; give your patrons what they want, something real good. The Vitagraph, as usual, has anticipated your wants, and will release "Jean and the Waif" on Dec. 24.

We can never forget the children at the yuletide, and the little waif is brought home to us and we take it to our hearts and home. Jean is there and there never was a dog like Jean. She's a beauty and we are always glad to see her. She is always so well behaved and does the right thing in the right place.

Here's a Christmas picture that is out of the beaten path and eminently a "Life Portrayal" in every sense of the word. A true and typical picture of a policeman's life. "Clancy," he's only a cop, but he's got a heart as big as his body and the courage that makes men, the right kind of men, with the generous nature of the race from which he sprung. A love story, a Christmas tree, and the little child, so essential to the Christmas spirit, are all there. The scenes are laid in and among the shadows of a great city and give an idea of what Christmas and every other day mean to the men who defend our lives and property. "Clancy" will start on his rounds on Friday, Dec. 23.

"In Neighboring Kingdoms."—A very picturesque, quaint film of ancient lore. A fairy tale introducing a pair of live geese that play a very important part in the story. Kate Greenaway's features lend a novel tinge to the costumes and characters. "Old Mother Goose" must have had a hand in this Vitagraph Christmas release just to please the children and fascinate the grownups. We all love to visit Fairyland and spend a good half hour outside this workaday old world. We can do so during the Christmas week. "In Neighboring Kingdoms" comes to us on Tuesday, Dec. 27. Between this and then don't forget "Playing at Divorce," "The International Motor Boat Races," "A Dixie Mother," and "The Light in the Window."

Miss Florence E. Turner, "The Vitagraph Girl," has returned from Maine in the flush of health and greatly benefited by her two months' vacation.

New photographs of the Vitagraph players have been taken; the thirty-eight members of the stock company have had special sittings for these pictures. They are of large cabinet size, of high finish and quality, suitable for lobby or wall display. These will be furnished to exhibitors at a nominal price and will be ready for sale by Dec. 1.

On Saturday night, Nov. 19, a "Viitagraph Night" was given at Portland, Me., by Miss Turner, the "Vitagraph Girl," with Jean, the "Vitagraph Dog," as an extra feature.

PLAYING THE PICTURES

By Clyde Martin

YOU may say it is none of my business, when I dwell on the illustrated song question, but, as I told you before, when the audience leaves your theatre, having heard some of the trash that is printed in music form and offered by some of the best-known publishers, they say, "The pictures were fine, but the music was disgusting." This throws as much blame on the piano player as it does the singer, and no matter what efforts the piano player has made to "play the pictures," the music has been condemmed.

I can safely say, that the song question in the motion picture theatres has had a great deal to do with the trouble that has been raised by the censorship boards in the different cities. I believe the songs that have been used in the picture houses have given the police and authorities more room for the action they have taken in their crusade against the picture business, than any picture that has ever been thrown on a screen. It is very gratifying indeed, to know that Chief of Police LeRoy T. Steward, of Chicago, has outlawed a number of these questionable songs, and I believe this has been brought about by the untiring efforts of C. P. McDonald, the Music Editor of The Show World. A censorship board has also been appointed by the city council of Springfield, Ill., for the purpose of barring from that city such suggestive songs.

Some of the songs that have been condemned by the Chicago Chief of Police are, "When I Get That Loving Feeling," "Oh, You Devil Rag," "Do Your Duty, Doctor," "The Dance of the Grizzly Bear," "Casey Jones" and "Her Name Was Mary Wood, but Mary Wouldn't." The daily papers of Chicago have taken up the fight with the Chief of Police and I believe the time is near when the authorities of the different cities will see their mistake in condemning the motion picture theatre; they will find it is the songs and not the pictures that need to be censored. It seems that the police authorities have hit the nail on the head when they have started at the bottom of the evil, the publisher, and the first complaints were filed last Wednesday in the Municipal Court of Chicago against H. S. Talbot, a publisher, at 184 Dearborn street, charging him with distributing a song that has failed to come up to the standard of decency established by the police department under the city ordinances. It is the aim of Sergt. O'Donnell, of Chicago, to make the rounds of the cheap theatres and listen to the songs, and any he finds beyond the limits of decency, he will arrest the singer. I believe C. P. O'Donnell, of The Show World staff, should have the glad hand out for anyone that will make a crusade against the late popular songs that the writers have to resort to smut to make them popular.

Have you ever noticed, when one of these "smut" songs are used in a picture house, they always get a hand? And have you noticed the hand comes from the "rough necks?" If you are catering to the low element of your city I can think of no better drawing card than such songs as "I Love It," "Company in the Parlor," "'Tis Hard to be a Lady in a Case Like That" or "That Lovin' Melody Rubenstein Wrote."

Has the time come that the publishers have to resort to such low, degrading stuff, in order to stay in business. It is a cinch the better class of people, the ones you are catering to, are not demanding this kind of "music."

There is no way possible for the general public to get a wrong conception of the publishers meaning in these titles and words. The publishers are making every effort to make it clear that they mean just what they say, for some of their advertising matter is lower (if possible) than the songs. For instance, in some of the advertising matter for the late song "I Love It," published by the Harry Von Tilzer Publishing Company, of New York, they say, "It is a little word, but can mean many big things." Now wouldn't this advertising look good on a three-sheet in front of your picture house? so the children could figure "it" out?

No, don't put me down as a crank, I write this because I know what is good for the picture industry, and what is not. If you are obliged to put on this trash in your picture house, if you cannot find decent music, don't cater to a family business, change your location, move to the slums and you will soon have a fat bank account.

Have you ever noticed, when the illustrated song comes on, the people, either leave the theatre or start up a conversation with those around them? and then as soon as the pictures start the house is quiet again. I think this would be enough to prove to the exhibitors that the majority of the people come for the pictures and not the songs.

On the other hand, if you can get a good singer, one that can handle good ballads and classic music you will find your audience will greatly appreciate the music, and it provides a good relief for your program. I believe the songs in the picture theatre would have a better standing to-day if the managers and singers would have used better judgment in their selections.

If this keeps up the illustrated song will be greatly injured and only spot light songs will be used. The fault is the carelessness of the slide rental agencies. They put me in mind of some of the fly-by-night film exchanges. I mean those that have not bought a reel of film for a year and are working on their original investment. The average slide renter is working on the same plan, when their customer has used their entire stock they give him repeaters until he gets next to himself and tries another. I recently saw a shipment of three sets of song slides from a house making a specialty of the rental business, with twenty-one slides, out of forty cracked, and two of the chorus slides missing. Good combination is it not? first run film service and five year slide service.

Well, to get back to "Playing the Pictures" there is another great point that is sadly neglected, not by the piano player but, by the manager, and that is, the care of the piano. I have found in visiting different picture houses, that nine out of every ten pianos are in need of tuning. I will say that the wear and rough use that some of them get, it would be well for the manager to have a piano tuner on his salary list and keep him employed the year round. But, with the average use a piano gets in a picture theatre, it should be gone over at least every six weeks by an expert, not a "dub."

A great mistake that is made by many exhibitors is, placing the piano in a pit. When you place a piano in a pit, it deadens the tone, and no matter how hard the piano player works, his music seems to have a dull finish. It is much better, if possible, to elevate the piano, so that the tones carry over the entire house and it makes the work much lighter for the musician. If you have room to place the piano on the stage next to the picture screen, you will find it will give great results. Another inexpensive improvement is to remove the rollers from the piano and place a heavy glass insulator under each corner, by raising the instrument from the floor it will add greatly to the tone quality.

In next week's article I will offer some suggestions of appropriate music for some of the notable releases of the last two weeks, such as "Sunshine Sue," Biograph, "Woman of Samaria" Pathe, and "Francesca Da Rimini" Vitagraph.

NEW JAMESTOWN PHOTOPLAY THEATRE OPENS.

The new photoplay theatre at the corner of Main and First streets, Jamestown, N. Y., opened to a crowded house Nov. 10. The program consisted of only the latest motion pictures and illustrated songs. As there will be no vaudeville or any prizes given, the management will change the entire program of pictures every day.

The house is modern in every way, and affords the patrons plenty of room; the seats being large enough for a patron to not be cramped. Good music is also one of the features.

APPEALS FOR MOTION PICTURES

Rev. J. R. Postlewait of Kansas City Wants One Installed in His Institute—Will Educate Children

Before a called meeting of philanthropic workers of Kansas City, Mo., which was held in the Y. M. C. A. auditorium last week, the Rev. J. R. Postlewait, of the Twenty-ninth street institute, delivered a most stirring address in behalf of motion pictures being used in charitable institutions. Just before the close of his discourse, he made this appeal: "Give me enough money to purchase, and the use of, instructive and amusing films, and I eventually will make more good law-abiding citizens out of the children of the poorer districts than by months of preaching."

The Twenty-ninth street institute, which is situated in the milling district of Kansas City, is to some extent isolated from the main part of the city. In that section there are thousands of children who have no place of amusement whatever, and by having a motion picture machine installed in the institute, would greatly add to the moral uplift of the children in that section of the town.

Owing to the lack of proper entertainment for the young people in that section, Rev. Mr. Postlewait says that the pool rooms and saloons take in about $800 every day, where, if there was some sort of proper amusement, not half that amount would be spent in such places. Besides trying to get a motion picture machine in the institute, Rev. Mr. Postlewait is having the gymnasium, reading rooms and baths completed in order that they may be used this coming winter.

PICTURES PAY IN FREDERICK, MD.

Since the City Opera House, Frederick, Md., installed pictures, business has been booming. Every performance is well attended, and the management is running more than 5,000 feet of the latest films daily. There is always some new and novel attraction to add to the interest of the entertainment which keeps the audience continually on the alert.

Until the City Opera House installed pictures, the management had found the theatre a poor investment—big attractions did not draw well, owing to the nearness of Baltimore and Washington. It was also thought that pictures would not add anything of consequence to the box receipts, but since they were installed, the house has been crowded nightly. Only the best and latest licensed pictures are used.

NEW PHOTOPLAY THEATRE FOR UTICA.

A motion picture theatre to cost about $6,000, is to be built in the near future on Mary street, a short distance east of Third avenue, Utica, N. Y. It will be called the Columbus Theatre, and will have a seating capacity of about 650 persons, all on the ground floor. The theatre, which is to be 52 feet wide and 80 feet deep, will have a pressed brick front with litholite trimmings in imitation of marble, a vestibule of tile and the interior of the building will be decorated in stucco. The ticket office will be located in front of the center of the vestibule. On the left of the entrance will be a retiring room for women, and on the right, one for men. There will be a box on either side of the orchestra pit. The proscenium arch will be built 20 feet wide and 12 feet high, the stage 12 feet deep and 3 feet, 6 inches from the floor. The floor will have a pitch of five feet from the entrance to the orchestra pit. Arrangements have been made for proper ventilation.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyright by J. H. Hallberg. All Rights Reserved.

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 13.—With a given system of electric mains running in front of a number of buildings, whether two-wire or three-wire system, perfect results can be had if the voltage supplied to the mains is constant, the mains are of proper size, the transformer of proper size, and the load properly balanced between the "neutral" and each outside wire.

With a system as that described above, great troubles may be experienced if the voltage varies, if the wires are too small, if the transformer is too small, or does not regulate well, and if additional load is added without consideration being given to the proper balancing of the load and the necessary increase in size of transformer, mains, service wires, electric meter, switches and fuses.

Electrical Service (Continued).

In "Electrical Talk, No. 13," I referred to an installation for a motion picture theatre in building J, of figure 29, you will recollect, or by referring to the last talk, you will see that the load for this theatre consisted of the M. P. lamp and a number of incandescent lamps, which had to be connected for 110 volts, and that in order to give this voltage, the electric light company had to use the neutral and one outside wire if the three-wire system, and we also found that the system became unbalanced on account of this installation, which is, of course, undesirable for reasons which have already been explained to you. The inconvenience from variations in the voltage not only effects the operator in the M. P. theatre as his light is likely to be poor, but it also effects other consumers supplied from the same system. In many instances the electric light companies find it convenient to make such a connection, because it has to be made in a hurry, or they do not anticipate difficulties which might arise therefrom. A much better way would have been to supply the theatre J with current from a separate transformer, the primary of which could be connected to the high voltage primary line wires, and the 110-volt secondary transformer wires could then be connected to the two-wire service. This would overcome all the trouble, and there would then be no voltage drop due to unbalanced load on account of the M. P. lamp in theatre J. It is the aim of all electric-lighting companies under modern management to avoid the unbalancing of a three-wire system by putting in separate transformers and service for customers who have a load of such nature that it is likely to unbalance the system, but sometimes it becomes necessary for the manager or the operator of the M. P. theatre to register a kick about the drop in voltage when the M. P. lamp is switched on and the consequent rise in voltage when the lamp is switched off, and the sooner the electric light company is made aware of this voltage variation, and corrects it, the better for all concerned.

The Electric Service Within a Building.

After proper mains have been brought into a building for the supply of electric current, a service switch with fuses of proper capacity must be installed as close to the entrance of the wires as convenient. The purpose of this switch is to disconnect entirely the electric current supply from the building at night, so as to insure perfect safety and also give the proprietor absolute insurance that no single lamp is burning which would cause the meter to register unexpectedly and unnecessarily.

The electric lighting company will then install an electric meter of proper size, and the wires from the meter may then be run to an electric distribution panel, which must contain the necessary fuses and switches for the protection of the various groups of lamps, fans, motion picture machines, flaming arc lamps, spot lights, etc. The panel board referred to is usually located at a convenient point where the manager or other person in charge has full control of every circuit, permitting the turning on and off of the various circuits, and the fuses should be of proper capacity to protect the wires connected to the switches.

The term "panel board" usually signifies a small switch board made of slate, upon which is mounted bus-bars to which the mains are connected, including also the proper number and size, switches and fuses which are connected to the bus-bars. The various circuits are then connected to the switches.

Two-Wire Service.

Line fuses;
Line switch;
Meter;
Panel board for 10 circuits.

It is evident that in place of the panel illustrated, a cheaper form of distributing board can be constructed. For instance, in place of the board illustrated, there could be used a number of double-pole, double-branch, combined cutouts and switches mounted on the usual form of porcelain base as illustrated in figure 31. Wherever panel boards or cutouts are installed, they should be mounted in a suitable box, which should preferably be made of slate, or it should be lined with sheet iron and provided with a door lined with the same material, so as to make a practically fire-proof cabinet, and the door should be provided with a lock, so that outsiders may not have opportunity to interfere with the fuses or switches. No panel box is complete without at leatst one extra fuse for each circuit to be on hand in case of an emergency.

A panel board should always be examined at frequent intervals to make sure that all connections are tight, also make sure that the fuse plugs, or any other form of fuse that are used, make good and perfect contact. The switches should occasionally be examined to see that the clips make good contact with the switch blade, and a little vaseline or flaked graphite applied to the clips will prove advantageous and will increase the life of the switch, also insuring better operation.

Attention to these small details will oftentimes prevent trouble, and there is one thing you should remember, and that is that a loose contact or an overloaded wire, fuse or other connection always cost you money, because a loose contact or a small wire generates heat, and as this heat requires electric energy, it represents a useless expense, besides a loose contact will also lower the voltage to such an extent as to interfere with the proper operation of your installation.

SUMMARY.

Electric service within a building must be amply protected by proper fuses and switches, and a suitable distribution panel should be located at a convenient point giving full control of all circuits within the building.

Frequent examination should be made of all contacts, fuses and switches to insure minimum loss and to improve the operation of the lamps and apparatus connected to the system.

In our next "Electrical Talk" we will discuss the three-wire service within a building.

PART PROCEEDS WILL GO TO CHARITY.

At a conference between the lessees of the Colonial Theatre, Indianapolis, Ind., and Supt. M. T. Hyland regarding the law pertaining to the running of photoplay performances on Sunday, resulted in a decision for the photoplay managers. It was claimed that, if part of the proceeds were given to charity, the theatre people were not violating the Sunday amusement law.

There is a city ordinance prohibiting vaudeville performances on Sunday, but as this says nothing about photoplay shows, they will be permitted to run, providing that part of the proceeds go to charitable purposes. The managers are not only willing to do this, but will help any worthy charitable institution that is struggling for existence.

Problems of the Photoplay Operator Discussed and Questions Answered

Edited by Will C. Smith

Warren, Pa., writes: I have had trouble with my Power's No. 5 Machine. The left side of the picture is fogged. This machine has always been this way.

Answer—As to your picture always being fogged, you might have a little oil on your lens or your condenser might need cleaning, or your cooling plate on the left hand side might extend out a little and in that way you would find that your picture would have a tendency to blur on our side. If such is the case I would advise you to file it down a little. Also, your lens may not be setting in the machine properly and that would have a tendency to make your picture blur on one side, or you might be working on a little angle. I could go on mentioning more things but in probability the cooling plate extends out too far. Would like to have more information and then I can get to it much better. Probably no fault of machine.

Ground, Mt. Holly, N. J., writes: When I have a ground in my lamp (arc) how can I find out which arm is grounded?

Answer—Attach a short wire to either binding post of an incadesent lamp socket. Throw in your operating switch, but do not light your lamp (arc). Put one end of your test lamp wire to one arm of your lamp (arc) near the carbon and the other to the rack bars, or base of your lamp, and if your test lamp lights the ground is in the other carbon arm. If it does not light try it on the other carbon arm the same way—by putting one end of the wire on the rack bars, or base of lamp, and the other on the carbon arm and if your test lamp lights the ground is at the first arm tried. If it lights on neither arm then the ground is elsewhere.

Van, Worth, Ohio, writes, asking the cause of dark spot in the center of his curtain. Says he has tried moving his lamp (arc) backward and forward as well as the whole lamphouse. Says his carbons are set as they should be. Is using alternating current and an Inductor. Also wants to know what focal length condensing lenses should be used for 9x12 picture at 46 feet.

Answer.—I think your trouble lies in the fact that you have your lower carbon just a little too far in advance of your upper carbon. This would cause the lower carbon to burn so that it interferes with the light, causing a shadow on your curtain. What you want on alternating current is to set your carbons so that they will be perpendicular,—that is, so that they are directly centered; so that the current in traveling around the carbon end will be evenly balanced. It is also possible that your condensing lenses are of a wrong focal length. What you need for that size picture at 46 feet is one 6½ inch and one 7½ inch condenser. Put the thick one towards the light and the thin one towards the screen. This rule, however, does not always carry out on a short distance. Some times you have to put the thin one (7½ in.) towards the light and the thick one (6½ in.) towards the screen. Measure your condensers as follows: Hold the condenser with the flat side up to a piece of white paper pinned to the wall. Then bring it in and out, being sure to hold it direct with the paper, until the image on the window is sharp and distinct on paper. Then measure from the paper to the flat side of the condenser. This will give you the focus of the condenser. It is more than likely though, that your main trouble is that your carbons are not set properly. Would like to hear further from you as to what success you have.

Out of Focus.

Hartford, Ct., writes: I am using an Edison One-pin Improved Exhibition Model Machine and sometimes I have a very fine picture that is good and sharp all over, then without touching the lens adjustment, the picture becomes dim, or I should say out of focus; then it becomes all right again. Then again the picture will be clear and bright on one portion and not in another.

Answer.—I think the trouble lies either in your aperture plate or your tension springs, or in both. Look carefully at your aperture plate, and if worn to any extent, get a new one. Set your tension springs so that they bear squarely on the tracks and then tighten so that they will stay. I am sure that your tension springs are loose and shift from one side to the other, causing the film to buckle slightly as it passes the aperture. Worn aperture plate tracks would have the same effect.

Setting Bushings.

Portland, Me., writes: Will you please tell me what is the proper way to set the eccentric bushings so that star and cam will run true? I have been told that there are several ways of setting them, but I would like to know the best way.

Answer.—As you say, you have been told there are several ways of setting the eccentric bushings but you want to know the best way to set them. Would say that as to the setting of the eccentric bushings, the whole thing is to set them so as to eliminate the lost motion between the STAR and CAM, at the same time keeping the two shafts (star and cam shaft) exactly parallel to each other. The slots in the bushings bear the same relative position to the hole, so that if one slot is the same angle as the other the two shafts are parallel.

W. A. McL., Oil City, writes: Would be pleased to have you answer the following questions throug your columns in the Film Index.

1. We use direct current. What would cause blue "ghost" or spot in center?

2. What would cause a blue fringe around the high-lights and titles, and how can it be remedied?

3. The picture is not as clear at the bottom as it is at the top. What would remedy that? I use Motiograph Machine.

Answer. 1. To eliminate the blue "ghost" or spot in center of picture would advise to move lamp (arc) back far enough so that the spot just covers the aperture. Also, you might move your lamphouse back or forward. If this does not take it out, would suggest changing to different focal length condensers. You do not say what distance you are working from, or what size picture you have; therefore, cannot advise you as to size of condensers needed, but could recommend 7½ inch focus condensers or one 7½ inch and one 8 inch focus condenser.

2. The blue fringe around the high lights and titles would indicate that your shutter is out of time with your picture. That is easily remedied as follows: Have the TWO wings just barely come together in exactly the center of the aperture just as intermittent sprocket starts to move and you will have it set right, and then your titles and high-lights as well as all the picture will come out all right.

3. To have your picture clear at bottom as well as top it is very essential that your screen be on the same angle as machine. I presume you are working from a balcony and that your picture is smaller at the top than at the bottom. In this case would recommend that you try and arrange your screen so that the bottom of screen would be brought nearer to the light and you will then get a clear picture at both top and bottom. I think that if you follow these instructions you will have no more trouble.

O. A. N., of Lindsborg, Kan., writes: We have noticed the articles in the Film Index regarding questions answered and, as we are very eager to give our patrons the best for their money, we must understand the operation of machine thoroughly and your information will be appreciated. We use an Edison Improved Exhibition One-pin Machine.

1. Would like to know a remedy for picture jumping both sideways and up and down on the screen?

2. A remedy for film jumping off lower sprocket, causing the loss of loop?

3. Are the bushings for the intermittent sprocket made for adjustment?

Answer. 1. The remedy for eliminating the jumping of film up and down on the screen, also sideways, is to adjust star and cam. To do this you loosen the set screws holding the bushings in the framing-carriage of the machine and use a screwdriver in the slots of the bushings, making very sure that the star and cam fit snug. Then tighten the set screws in framing-carriage holding bushings. This will eliminate the jumping of film up and down. If, after doing this, you find no good results, it is possible that the pins holding the intermittent sprocket are loose, causing lost motion in the sprocket, and in this case I would suggest new pins. The side movement of film is remedied by loosening the set screws holding the bushings and moving the bushing closer to the intermittent sprocket and then tighten the set screws.

2. Remedy for film jumping off lower sprocket. It might be that your lower sprocket is not in line with your intermittent sprocket, and if not, that would cause the film to jump off the lower sprocket; or the tension spring holding the lower roller on take-up feed sprocket may be weak, so that when a patch goes through it throws your film off. In this case I would recommend a heavier tension spring.

3. Bushings for the intermittent sprocket are always made for adjustment, and if adjusted properly you will always get a good steady picture. Would like to hear from you as to what success you have.

J. A., New York City writes: If white plastered wall would make a good surface (or screen) to project pictures on and what preparation he should put on it.

Answer.—Any clean, white solid surface makes the best screen for the projection of pictures. The use of a white plastered will is very good. No preparation is necessary other than a good smooth, clean surface. Should any spots get on same they can very easily be removed by using (lightly) a piece of sandpaper around a block of wood.

Tifen, Ohio, writes, how can he focus his Moving Picture before starting the machine.

Answer.—Take a piece of paper the same thickness and width as film, having the paper a little ragged, and put it in the machine, closing the gate upon it just as you would on the film and focus until it stands out good, sharp and distinct.

BIOGRAPH CO.

"A PLAIN SONG."—"Love thy father and thy mother." Adhere strictly to this injunction and the way will be clear. In time of temptation or of threatening evil, the thought of our parents will lead us from the path of error. So many are the snares and pitfalls laid in the way of youth that it is only through this agency that an escape is made. This Biograph subject is a most lucid illustration of this problem. Edith is a salesgirl in a department store and toils arduously to eke the lives of her decrepit mother and blind father. Quasi-poverty is their condition, as Edith's meager pittance is all there is to depend on for the existence. Sadly she compares her ownloneliness with the condition of her storemates, as she views them passing by with their sweethearts, light-hearted and happy. Hence it is small wonder that she feels highly flattered and pleased at the attentions of a traveling repertoire manager who enters the store advertising his show, and presents Edith with two complimentary tickets for that evening's performance. The next day the manager appears again at the store and invites her to take a stroll with him. This is the first attention the poor girl has ever experienced, and when the manager tries to persuade her to go away with him it is a supreme struggle with inclination that prevents her leaving her old folks. The manager leaves her with ill-concealed displeasure and the next time he visits the store he tries to win her through jealousy by flirting with one of the other girls. This has the effect and she yields to the great temptation of meeting him after store hours. With renewed endeavor he persuades her and she at last consents to go away with him, leaving a letter for her parents to the effect that she is tired of the drudgery, and longing for pleasure has gone away. Arriving at the railroad station, where she is to meet her tempter, she sees a party of old folks on their way to the almshouse. One of them is sightless and a voice from the soul speaks to her. "Remember thy father and thy mother." And she does remember, seeing them most vividly in her mind's eye. This thought so impels that she at last realizes that she is playing with fire, and turning on her heel, runs back home to find that the letter she had written is gone from the table where she left it. However, her fears are allayed when she finds the letter in possession of her blind father who, of course, cannot read it. Taking it and tearing it to bits, she folds her dear old papa in her arms as her mother enters to share in the embrace. Her eyes opened to the falseness of the world, she is now more than ever determined to perform her sacrificial duty of caring for the old folks.

"EFFECTING A CURE."—Wifey, if hubby goes out to the club and hits up the "foolish water" more often than is concurrent with your views, don't waste energy in curtain lectures or upset domesticity by "going home to mamma," but wait and scheme, and there is sure to come a chance when you can either scare him into absolute corrigibility, or make him feel like thirty cents in Mexican money. This Biograph subject will afford many a wife an opportunity to profit by its lesson. Mrs. Wilkins and her mother leave home to spend the night with friends, and will return some time next day. Wilkins ejaculates the time-honored "Hurrah! Hurrah!" for he is afforded an opportunity of going to the club, indulging freely, and returning home at any old time with possibly a heavy head, but a fearless heart, as there will be no feminine voice calling into the outer darkness: "So there you are, you drunken brute." No need to climb stairs shoeless; no danger of bumping against furniture in black dark rooms. No, his entrance shall be made in a blaze of light. Well, all transpired as he anticipated. After the session at the club, during which ardent devoirs were paid to Great King Gambrinus, Wilkins is escorted home by a cabby. Sinking into a Morris chair, he falls to sleep in a jiffy. In this condition wifey and mother find him. Do they cry out and attempt to arouse him. Not much. Wifey and Mamma are wise ones, so with the aid of the friends of hubby, they devise a plan to cure him of his drinking. To this end they invent "the other woman," pressing into service a lady friend who writes a note to Wilkins accepting an offer of marriage which she pretends he made her while in his cups. Of course, he is in no condition to remember where he was or what he did the night before. In truth, he wasn't outside his club. The lady also accepts an invitation she pretends he extended to take luncheon with him at two o'clock at his house. The reception of this note affects him like a dynamite bomb. Rushing to the club he asks his chums, who are of course in on the scheme: "Did I?" They reply: "You certainly did." Even the girl, whom he also seeks out, keeps up her end of the trick and expresses her unalterable intention of coming to luncheon. Rushing back to the club he exclaims: "Good Heavens! I must get my wife out by two o'clock." A friend offers him two tickets for the matinee. "Ah, the very thing." He breathes easier when wifey and mother consent to go, but, curse the luck, just as they are about to get ready, in come two visiting friends. "Great Scott! I must have two more." These are procured after a mad race to and from the club. All the while the hands of the clock are pushing tantalizingly toward two P. M. The worst comes when the visitors decline to attend the matinee, so there promises to be a warm luncheon that afternoon at the Wilkins' domicile. Two o'clock arrives, and with it the luncheon party. Wifey meets the "other woman" with pretended injured dignity. Well, the result is that Wilkins is thoroughly in earnest when he exclaims: "Never Again."!

"THE FLAT NEXT DOOR."—At a family hotel the room of Mr. Young Man and Old Boy are separated by the apartment of a young and rich widow, who is fortunate enough to be loved by both. Mr. Young Man with youthful impetuosity is the first to make a declaration of love and is accepted. Mr. Old Boy, who is now treated coldly when he presents himself, is so grieved that he decides to commit suicide. After having found the barrel of a revolver too cold to bring about a really pleasant death he hits upon the idea of hanging himself and immediately lays plans for his "taking off." When the crucial moment arrives he finds inventive genius is indeed powerless against the pranks of fate, for when he makes the drop which was to prove fatal the hangsman's rope severs and the force of his fall carries him through the floor of his room into the widow's drawing room. It happens that at the same time two robbers are in the room and the sight of Mr. Old Boy entering through the ceiling so fairly frightens them that they make a rapid exit. Mr. Young Man who was in the drawing room when the robbers enter, became so frightened that he fled leaving the widow to the tender mercies of the rogues. The lady now pays her obligations to Mr. Old Boy by rejecting the young man and taking her rescuer in his stead.

"TARASCON ON THE RHONE."—A travelogue given to the motion pictutre public with the idea of making them familiar with a new city in the southern part of France. Tarascon is situated on the left bank of the Rhone opposite the town of Beaucaire and connected to it by a suspension and railway bridge. The city of Tarascon is about one hundred and fifty miles south of Lyons and is of interest to the traveler particularly for its several old gothic cathedrals, many ruined castles and the tombs of St. Martha and Louis II., King of Provence. We are first shown the bridge spanning the Rhone between the cities of Tarascons and Beaucaire, after which we are taken on a short trip up the river to the old castle which was begun by Count Louis II. in the Fourteenth Century, and finished by King Rene of Anjoe in the Fifteenth Century. The old turret stair and chapel entrance are charming examples of Fifteenth Century architecture. The castle is now used as a prison and it is but a few moments walk from this famous old building to the quaint market street and town hall which we next visit. After enjoying the various activities of the natives at this place of barter we are next shown the statue in memory of the town's deliverance from a dragon, La Tarasque, a legendary monster which threatened the town in the early part of the Fourteenth Century. Our little journey is shortly brought to a close by a little tour to the Villa Tartarn and the castle of Beaucaire which we view by the rays of the setting sun.

"LURED BY A PHANTOM, OR THE KING OF THULE."—This is a beautifully colored film telling the touching story of that melancholy ruler whose sorrow at the death of his sweetheart drove him to leave his throne and follow a vision to his death. "A TRIP THROUGH CEYLON."—That island in the Indian Ocean separated on the northwest from continental India by the Gulf of Mannar, is one of the best known localities in the world so far as the name their ordinary avocations; we see women water-carriers, quaint native carts, and men with huge leaves alone is concerned, and perhaps one of the least well-known as far as to actual knowledge. The island which is about 271 miles in length and 137 miles in width, provides a fruitful field for the camera man. Ours has been decidedly successful in obtaining some of the more characteristic views of the island and its people. This is a film that makes tropical scenes very vivid and real. Natives are photographed at over their heads, to keep off the sun's fierce rays as they work. There is an air of novelty about the succeeding pictures of elephants at work. They are seen dragging and pushing huge logs and then the day's tasks over, the scramble, with extraordinary agility, considering their great bulk, down a steep slope into the river. Here they roll in the mud and squirt water through their trunks, to the discomfort of the keepers who must not leave them.

"THE RETURN AT MIDNIGHT."—A picture that makes clear the difference between French marriage customs and our own. A Frenchman of mature years loves a gypsy girl, and he is therefore very nonplussed when his father introduces a young lady whom he has arranged with the girl's father that his son shall marry. The old people are greatly upset when the man refuses the proposed match, and his father on seeing him in company with the gypsy, sends him from his home. The man marries the woman of his choice, though the alliance is not a very prosperous one, for we see them two years later tramping along the road near the man's home, and evidently in the last stage of destitution. The wife goes to the house of her husband's father and they give her food. Left alone to sleep by the kitchen fire, she admits her husband. The old man hearing the two goes down, thinking the woman is the decoy of thieves. He is about to fire at the stranger when his daughter-in-law rushes forward and knocks up the gun. The father takes pity on the pair, and overlooks his son's disobedience.

"THE QUEEN OF HEARTS."—A romance of two worlds, having its inception in the banking house of Conklin. Cashier Black refuses to consider a loan on Farmer Allen's farm for $5,000.00.

Dick Harmon, the sweetheart of May Allen, the oldest daughter, is unfortunately poor—poor in purse but rich in manhood and this is the one reason he does not meet with favor with Cashier Black, who also has turned the father's mind against him. Dick decides to go to the gold fields and endeavor to seek his fortune there with hopes that some day he may return and claim the farmer's daughter.

The bank cashier seeing the reverse fortunes of Farmer Allen, sees an opportunity to wend his way into the affections of the daughter by proffering financial assistance and accordingly calls at the home and is introduced to May and at once presses his suit—takes personal mortgage on the farm and shows many personal courtesies to Allen.

In the meantime, Dick has not found pan-washing a profitable venture and writes May discouragingly of his prospects. All serves to further Black's hold on the friendship of May, and the wedding day is set, the honeymoon begun, almost at the same moment a second message is received from Dick telling of his good fortune and referring to her coming marriage with Black, and asks her to await his arrival. However, unfortunately she was already on her way to Europe.

Dick arrives at the old home only to find that he is too late. Later we find Black and his wife seated in their villa at Monte Carlo. Their experiences in far away Italy were not at all pleasing and many times May's mind would wander back to the little farm and her girlhood friend Dick.

A quick succession of events transpire rapidly and we find the mortgage is bought up by Dick and what appears as an accident, resulted in the death of Black. The final reuniting of and return to America of May and her first love.

"THE STEPMOTHER."—A happy brother and sister awaiting some news from their father, who had gone to the city for a visit. In time a letter came that cast gloom over the happy little farm house, saying he had a great surprise for them—that he had met a lovely woman and they were now the proud possessor of a stepmother. They are instructed to meet them at the station. Nellie remains at home to prepare for the newcomer while Joe goes to the station. Upon their arrival home the new head of the family is installed with no small amount of misgivings upon the part of Nellie and Joe.

Trouble is soon brewing and the first family row occurs. Tom, Nellie's sweetheart, calls on her and the stepmother taking a liking to him, orders Nellie away. A handbill announcing a farmer's dance is circulated, so all decide to attend the festivities. The next day the stepmother drives to town to buy clothes for the picnic and on the way she inadvertently comes upon Tom walking in for the same purpose. He is invited to ride with her. The scene then reverts to the farm, where father and son are cutting wood and Nellie is doing the washing.

The trading done in town the stepmother and Tom start on their return. When near the home Tom is left behind, a diplomatic move of the farmer's wife. Upon her arrival the usual greeting to her husband is missing and he is plainly perplexed. The day of the festivity arrives and everyone for miles around are there, the stepmother leaves the gathering for a walk and Tom shortly follows unnoticed. As the collection hat is being passed the farmer notices his wife's hand bag and being without change to contribute opens the purse and to his surprise finds a letter addressed to him. Upon opening it he is astonished to find it from his supposed wife's real husband.

"John Bentley:

Dear Sir—The woman you have married is an adventuress. She is only after your money. she is my wife, but deserted me two months ago and I have but now learned of her whereabouts. The enclosed photo of her will prove to you that I am not mistaken.

"Sincerely yours,
"EMMETT BROWN."

The father, son and daughter go in search and find she and Tom in fond embrace and he is convinced that the woman is not what he had so fondly imagined her to be. Upon their return to the farm she is sent away and the little family is again back at its starting point. John Bentley, his son and daughter are again happy.

A life drama that came near being a tragedy in which a man of lofty ideals is so overzealous in the glorification of self that he constantly denounces his young wife's girlish tastes and lightheartedness, until she is obliged to leave him, and on bended knees he acknowledges his faults and asks her forgiveness for his harshness and narrowness. ton joins forces with him and they start in to work a lead and strike paying dirt.

They have hardly started operations when Denton meets with a serious accident and again Harper shows the manner of man he is by nursing his pal back to health and strength. This brings about a strong friendship and they go to work with a will and it is not long before they strike it rich. Weighing up their gold dust they find they have a handsome pile and are now on easy street.

Harper goes out to work and has proceeded but a short distance when he is seen by the treacherous Mexican who stealthily watches him on his way and then makes tracks for the pals' shack.

Just after Harper leaves the shack Denton receives a telegram from his wife telling him his mother is sick and advising him to return home at once. He leaves a letter for Harper with the despatch stating that he will leave the gold dust intact as he has sufficient cash and the message will explain the cause of his hasty departure.

The Mexican can be seen peering through the window watching Denton and the hiding of the dust in the chimney. Denton then hastily exits and hurries for the train. The villainous greaser enters the cabin, steals the gold and destroys the letter and telegram and replaces them with a note saying Denton had gotten tired and skipped.

When Harper returns and finds the note he is furious, tells the sheriff and follows Denton East. Arriving at Denton's home town he traces him through an accident to a little child who happens to be Denton's own daughter. He carries the child home and the next day calls to see the little girl, and while he is sitting by her bedside Denton comes in.

It is a dramatic situation, but after explanations and the reception at that moment of a "wire" from the sheriff in the gold field announcing the confession of the Mexican all is understood and once more the two men become pals and renew their bond of friendship.

"SHADOW AND SUNSHINE."—The clerk grown grey in the faithful service of a single employer, arrives one morning to find the young nephew of his boss occupying the desk he himself has had so long. Brutally he is told that he is too old to perform his duties properly and is ordered away. At first his stunned brain is unable to comprehend the situation, but gradually he comes to realize that he is being dismissed and frantically he pleads for a chance to make a living, pointing out that with the small wage paid him he has been unable to save anything and in a frenzy seeks to take his chair by force from the younger man. But he is driven from the office and in a daze he makes his slow progress homeward to tell the faithful wife that he has been dismissed.

Here, at least, he finds sympathy, but it is the sympathy of a common sorrow, for she, too, realizes that they have been plunged into the Shadows of Poverty. Bravely the old man goes out to look for work, but none have use for him and sometimes churlishly, sometimes with pity he is told there is nothing for him. One or two offer charity, but this is refused. He cannot bring himself to take alms. And when the shadows seem the blackest a solution of the problem seems to suggest itself. He cannot longer support his wife. Their scanty store of money will last longer if there is only one to spend it and all will be kinder to the widowed woman. His foot has caught in a length of rope and with this in his hand he seeks the seclusion of a deserted building. Throwing the rope around a beam and climbing upon an old box he murmurs a brief prayer and kicks the box away. The beam is rotten and the sudden weight tears it from its support. There is a shower of plaster and something that tinkles and the surprised suicide finds himself sitting amidst thousands of dollars in gold and paper money. It seems a dream at first but the money is very real and with trembling hands the old man fills a pocket. Now that he has money he feels more brave and he returns to the old office to argue with his employer against his dismissal. It is to no avail, but in his vest pocket is a pencil, the property of the firm. This is taken from him and the employer insists upon making further search for what he terms stolen property. The gold is disclosed and refusing to believe so strange a tale a policeman is called in and all adjourn to the police station. It is agreed that the money does not belong to the old man, but a young reporter "doing police" draws out a copy of his paper and shows that the old man is heir to the property and therefore the legal owner of the money. The clerk is released, the employer given stinging dismissal and the clerk passes from out of the Shadow of Poverty into the Sunshine of Prosperity.

"SPOONY SAM."—Sam could not help spooning any more than he could help eating. He had three square meals a day and spent the remainder of the time spooning pretty Sue. Sue was quite willing to be spooned though there was another chap who wanted to marry her and Sam had a fine time. But Pa Sprague, Sue's father, had forgotten long ago the time when he himself was young and he had no sympathy with spooners. He told Sue she could not see Sam except in the house where Pa and Ma could keep an eye on them and Sue, like a dutiful daughter, sent word to Sam. But that didn't help matters much.

Sam spooned just the same. That was too much for Pa Sprague and he went after the minister. Immediate marriage took Sam all of a heap and he made a sprint for the door that was a record-breaker, and he didn't stop running until the sight of a young married couple admiring their first baby. That gave

PATHE FRERES.

"A BORDER TALE."—A band of smugglers are waiting at a tavern in a wild part of Bohemia for evening in order to carry some goods across the frontier. The entrance of Hansel, a customs officer, does not disturb them, as they know that he is in love with Malvina, the innkeeper's daughter. Presently the chief of the band enters accompanied by Zingara, a gypsy dancing girl, who is also one of the band. She offers to tell fortunes. The cards are shuffled and Malvina cuts a heart, for love, and a spade, the sign of death. Malvina looked scared, but Zingara's light laugh as she scatters the cards brings back a smile. The others leave, and Zingara is about to do so, when she sees a messenger hand a note to Hansel. She and the chief watch, and learn the instructions to the officer to lie in wait for the smugglers that night. Zingara is forced by the orders and threats of the chief to divert the danger by luring Hansel into their power. This she does, but afterwards releases him at the cost of her life, for in endeavoring to shield him from the pistol of the chief her own heart is penetrated by a bullet. So the evil omen of the cards comes true, although it is poor Zingara who pays forfeit. Her brave act, however, affords Hansel means to collect his men in time to intercept and overpower the smugglers, and Zingara's death is avenged by that of the chief at the hands of Hansel himself.

"A FREAK."—It is rather difficult to describe what the artist in this film does or does not do in the matter of twisting and turning his serpent-like form into extraordinary positions. As a contortionist the man is a marvel, and it seems almost incredible that he should possess a bone or a joint in his body. As it is, his limbs and body are at times twisted out of all human shape, giving rise to astonished exclamations as to how, without being made of rubber, he can possibly do it.

"WHO IS NELLIE?"—George Robbins thought that he would surprise his wife and buy her a horse for her birthday. She had been brought up in the country, and had always as a child been accustomed to have a horse at her disposal. George accordingly called at Greerson's livery, and after looking over some good-looking hacks, selected one called Nellie and gave his check in payment. Soon after his return home he is summoned to his office on pressing business, and leaves in a hurry. His wife, who adores him devotedly, discovers his check book on the floor, and with that curiosity that is born in most women, begins to look through it. Imagine her surprise when she finds the stub of the last check marked "For Nellie, $200." She has caught her husband deceiving her, and she has positive proof of his guilt. She can take no other step but return to her mother. So, leaving a note for George, that he can go to his Nellie, she departs. George returns as she is leaving the house, but she refuses to talk to him. Looking around he finds her note and also the check book. He begins to understand her actions. He writes her a line that he can explain everything

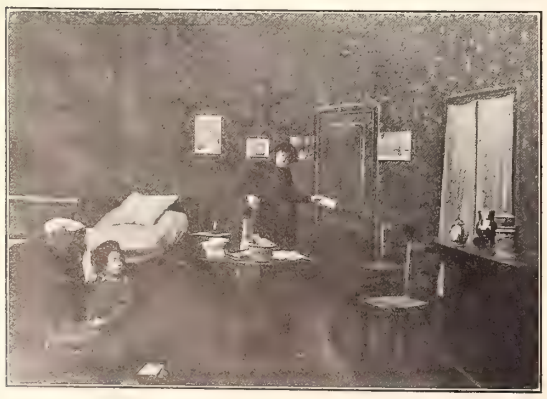
"FINLAND—FALLS OF IMATRA."—Tumbling, rolling, crashing, ever changing, but always the same, the waters of these glorious rapids are shown to perfection in this film. Sometimes the great masses of translucent green water crested with foam and overhung with filmy mists of spray, confront the vision in an uninterrupted vista. Sometimes the ceaseless movement of the waters is viewed through the delicate foliage of silver birch and larch, and from time to time a broadside view of the mighty torrent is flung upon the screen. Never are the rapids anything but superb, and at night, when the moon casts her magic beams upon the waters, turning the high-flung spray into showers of diamond drops, the fairylike beauty of the spectacle is beyond the limitations of words.

"THE TALE THE MIRROR TOLD."—Louisa Gerrin, a widow with a little boy of six years, is endeavoring to struggle her way through life. Her landlord refuses her any extra time for payment of her rent, and with a heavy heart she sends little Jack to school and goes to her own work as a sewing woman at the house of a well-to-do maiden lady. She keeps wondering what she will have to do now, that it looks as if she will be ejected from her lodging. It is hard for her to work, and her eyes wander aimlessly around the room. They rest upon a well-filled purse on the sideboard. She is tempted and she tries to dismiss the thought of stealing by applying herself more assiduously to her work. She cannot, however, resist. No one would know that she took it—there are other servants in the house—and Louisa rises from her chair to advance to the sideboard, then struggles with temptation, to retreat again to her chair. The mistress has at this time just sat down in her chair in the adjoining room to read her paper. She reads about a lady who was murdered by her servant for her purse. Instinctively she feels for her own, and remembers where she left it. She rises to fetch it, but in the mirror sees Louisa take it from the sideboard. Louisa has scarcely reseated herself before she is assailed with remorse. Her better self asserts itself, and not knowing that her mistress is watching her she replaces the purse. The old lady enters and finds the landlord's letter on the table, which she reads behind Louisa's back. A few seconds later little Jack comes in from school proudly wearing a medal presented to him for diligence. The old lady, compassionate for his mother, whom in the goodness of her heart she now desires to aid as delicately as possible, hands him four gold coins under the pretext of wishing to give him an additional reward.



"WHAT A DINNER!"—Dr. Chimp is decidedly eccentric and apparently rather likes to chew his way through a good dinner before retiring to rest. It is probably the excellence of this last meal that is responsible for the weird nightmare that assails him during his sleep. Certain it is that curious things befall him, as, for instance, the finding of himself in the kitchen of an old woman decidedly witch-like in appearance. Strange animals, shadowy in outline, but large in bulk, spring into existence at the instant command of the witch's black cat, and disappear with equal suddenness. Then the old woman sends her visitor flying before her broom, and he finds himself in his bed again. Imaginary struggles with elusive burglars and a clumsy nondescript-looking official end the night, and in the gray morning the doctor awakes to find himself desperately fighting the bed clothes.

"THE MAID OF NIAGARA."—The film opens with some love scenes between Esoomgit, a young warrior of the Iroquois tribe, and Red Doe, a chief's daughter, and one of the most beautiful of the Iroquois tribe. They return to the great camp, and Esoomgit seeks out her father, but he refuses his consent to her marriage with Esoomgit, stating that only a chief should marry his daughter. Great rivalry existed between the Iroquois and the Bison Indians, so when at a meeting of the two tribes Esoomgit excels himself by winning not only the marksmanship competition, but also the riding and swimming contests, it is only natural that he should be proclaimed a chief, and his marriage to Red Doe sanctioned by her father. It was now time for the annual sacrifice to propitiate the Spirit of the Cataract. This ceremony consisted in the selection by lot of one of the most beautiful daughters of the Iroquois and placing her in a canoe to float to death over the falls. The maidens take their seats in a circle. An arrow is shot high in the air. It falls at the feet of Red Doe. Escomgit is horrified. His bride-to-be is the one selected for the sacrifice. He tries to dissuade her. Her Strong sense of honor and duty to her tribe, how-

"Love thy father and thy mother." This is the most important injunction in all of God's commandments, for nothing will save youth from the snares and pitfalls laid in the way as this. It was the love little Edith bore her parents that saved her when sorely tempted to go away to what at first seemed a life of happiness. She, living a life of abject lonesomeness, caring for her poor old mother and blind father, listens to the persuasions of a traveling theatrical manager, and is finally induced to accompany him as a member of his repertoire company. At the railroad station she sees a party of poor folks on their way to the almshouse, and the sight seems ominous of the probable fate of her own parents, awakening her love for them, thus saving her from the fatal step.

"THE TOUCH OF A CHILD'S HAND."—The Kalem release for Wednesday, Nov. 30, is entitled "The Touch of a Child's Hand," and the title is truly descriptive of the theme. A contrast is drawn between Mr. Livingston, a wealthy widower and his little son Billie, and Dan Newton, a working man, and little Jimmie, his son. Each boy is idolized by his father. It so happens that little Jimmie is accidentally run down and killed by Mr. Livingston's automobile. Mr. Livingston does all that a gentleman could do to comfort the grief-stricken father and to make reparation, but Newton, crazed by his loss, his bereavement following a long period of hard luck, completely upsets his reason and in his ravings he comes to the conclusion that his loss of his little son can only be balanced by the death of Mr. Livingston's little boy. And with this idea in mind Newton gains entrance into the Livingston house at night and makes his way to the little boy's bedroom. He kneels by the child's crib, is about to plunge a knife into the heart of the sleeping child when the boy, stirring uneasily, lifts his little hand and places it gently on the cheek of the would-be assassin. The touch of the child's hand is sufficient to restore the father to his reason, and realizing the enormity of the deed he had contemplated he breaks into tears and is thus found by Mr. Livingston.

Accompanying "The Touch of a Child's Hand" is a pretty travelogue picture entitled "Up the Thames to Westminster," in which some novel photographic effects are introduced.

"ELDER ALDEN'S INDIAN BRIDE."—The Kalem Indian picture for Friday, Dec. 2, is again founded on a well authenticated historic episode and is entitled "Elder Alden's Indian Ward." During the period when the Puritans were in many parts of the country friendly with the Indians, it is well known a number of the prominent chiefs were frequently callers at the homes of the whites, and were often on terms of confidence. Elder Alden was a Puritan of a stern religious frame of mind, who had entered into such friendly relations with Chief Squantum, a noted Pequot Indian, and Chief Squantum, to show his faith in Elder Alden, brought to the Puritan his little son to be brought up as a white man. Elder Alden took in the little Indian boy and brought him up as one of his own, and when the lad reached young manhood his Indian blood asserted itself, and he not only refused to work, but in addition demanded the young daughter of Elder Alden as his squaw. Enraged at being refused of this, he left the Alden home and went back to his tribe, there becoming a thoroughly bad Indian and a leader in uprisings against the whites. His final act of treachery was to head a foray against the little settlement in which the Alden home was located. The aged Chief Squantum learning of the proposed raid traveled many weary miles to give the settlers warning, but he was too late, and the painted redskins headed by his own son burst into the Alden home just as the old chief was warning them to prepare their defense, and when thus confronted by the treachery of his son the old chief draws his knife and in defending the young girl kills his own son.

"THE GREATER LOVE."—How many tragedies of life are hidden behind care-worn faces. How many heart-aches are closed to the gaze of the passive eye. How little we really know of our fellow men. Each minute as it slips upon its way carries with it a dying groan, a cry of anguish, a sigh of oblivion. Each hour is the saddest in the whole life of someone, each hour the happiest to some other wayfarer, but of all the heartaches of all the agonies of the mind, the strongest of them all is when a mother realizes that her boy is a common thief, that he has thrown the inheritance of manhood away that all she has lived and suffered for has gone down in defeat. Ah, what agony is in her heart. It is just this agony that Mlle. Pilar Morin has so wonderfully portrayed in the Edison latest picture, "The Greater Love," which is Mlle. Morin's masterpiece in the motion picture world. She has given as her greatest work in every sense of the word, running the entire field of emotion of love, sorrow, anguish, self-sacrifice and renunciation of all that life holds dear. A wonderful piece of work summed up in a clear, simple, dramatic story that holds the spectators in its grip from the first glimpse of the young girl with her joy of life and triumph of loving to the supreme self-sacrifice of a mother's love for the sake of her boy.

The story itself is situated in the provincial district of France and reveals that stern law of the French parent who has command and control over the life and will of his child. The heart of this little French peasant girl has gone out to a young barrister whom she worships and who worships her with all the holy loyalty of a noble love, yet centuries of custom forces its way between them and the girl is compelled to bow down to her father's will. At the signing of the marriage contract we are shown her heart in all its sufferings and now time passes on. It is twenty years later and we see the result of a father's law. Annette, the daughter, has married her father's choice he is a coarse cruel brute—her life is crushed—the only gleam of joy that lights up her face is when her eyes rest upon her son, her boy. She worships him, but ere the day closes, the awful truth is revealed to her that her boy is a thief. Mlle. Morin at this point reaches the supreme climax of the art of silent drama. A moment more and the gendarmes are in the room searching for the thief and then the dumb terror seizes her. She sees her boy a prisoner. She sees him behind the iron bars—she sees him suffering. Ah, then the greater love comes forth and she takes the guilt upon herself. "I am the thief," but the law of a lie rarely finds a home in happiness and relief. It always reacts upon the offender which is clearly shown in this picture when she is brought before the justice. Who should it be but her former sweetheart. Here before the man she loves, she condemns herself with a lie as a common thief and he is forced to sentence her to one year at hard labor. We then catch a gleam of her prison life and finally her release. We then see her wandering back to her native village, penniless heart-broken and alone. Through the window of a village inn she beholds her boy gambling and drinking. She sends word to him but he turns from her. Can human being suffer more? At last she is found by the judge, taken to his home and through his love and care we realize that her life will be sweeter and that her boy will learn to bow down before that greater love which has given so much for him.

This picture is superbly mounted and the cast is one that is of the highest possible type. The Edison Company can well claim it as the masterpiece of Mlle. Morin's motion picture work.

"ARMS AND THE WOMAN."—Another story of the rugged life of the mining camps of the West. Mrs. Cushing, a widow, and her two children, a beautiful daughter and a son, whose inclinations are wayward, are residing in the mountains of California where Mrs. Cushing's late husband had some mining claims. The story opens when Mrs. Cushing receives by registered mail a package containing some two thousand dollars in currency, being the total sum realized on the sale of her husband's estate in Iowa. The son has just asked his mother for a loan of money. She at first refuses him but finally gives him some gold pieces and he leaves the home informing his mother that he is about to invest the money in such a way as to increase its amount. Without telling her son anything about it, in fact hiding the circumstances from him, Mrs. Cushing dispatches her daughter with the money which has just been received by registered mail, to deposit same where she can pay some assessments for work on the mining property. The girl starts with a satchel containing the currency and takes the stage at Dutch Flat. Meanwhile her brother has gone with the gold pieces given him to a gambling house where he loses every cent of it. A suspicious character is interested in his losses and watches him keenly. At the critical moment he calls him aside and is talking to him very earnestly when Hank Young, the big stage driver of Dutch Flat, steps up and informs young Cushing that he had better beware of the stranger, that he doesn't like the cut of his jib. Cushing resents any interference and Hank moves away rebuffed. We now watch the events which transpires in front of the postoffice at Dutch Flat. The stage comes in with a load of passengers who dismount and among them who start out on the next lap of the journey is Miss Cushing holding the bag with the money. There is some talk between the driver, Hank Young, and the postmaster about a messenger on the box, and he tells him that he will find the messenger at the next stop. The coach pulls out of Dutch Flat and no sooner has it gone than we see Young Cushing and the suspicious character trailing through the mountains over a short cut to head off the stage. When the latter arrives at the way station where the messenger was supposed to mount the box, Hank is informed by the stableman that no one is there to go with him. He tries to induce some cowpunchers to ride on the coach, but they refuse, saying they have business elsewhere. Miss Cushing, who is now the sole passenger in the stage, is somewhat afraid of being alone and the driver invites her to ride with him on the seat. We now reach a corner of the road at a wooded spot in the mountains. Young Cushing and his friend are seen masking themselves and going to ambush in order to hold up the stage. This they do and all seems going their way when Hank Young, the stage driver, recalls the fact that the little woman beside him has confided to him that there is two thousand dollars of her mother's money in the bag at her seat. He suddenly rouses himself to action and it will be necessary to see the film to realize the way in which he put the bad men to flight and the quietus on the stage robbing aspirations of Young Cushing. The thrilling moment of the picture is when Miss Cushing discovers that one of the robbers is her brother. She tells this to Hank and he relieves the tension of the situation in a most clever manner. Young Cushing has been badly wounded and Hank rushes his horses back to Dutch Flat where the sheriff attempts to arrest the man in the coach. Here Hank shows his quickness of wit by telling the sheriff that the wounded man was a passenger in the coach. For this he receives a look of tenderness and gratitude from Cushing's sister. Hank in his rough way has saved the family honor and the last scene of the picture shows him giving young Cushing the lecture of his life and its effect upon the boy. Hank leaves with the gratitude of mother and sister and a promise from the wayward son to live in the future as a wiser and a better man.

Altogether a dramatic, entertaining story acted with a full measure of the realization of the importance of the parts and scenically, photographically and in point of accuracy to detail, a film up to the best.

"THE COWPUNCHER'S GLOVE."—No matter how many motion pictures dealing with the life of the Western man of the plains are given to the market, there is always room for one more. The scope is so broad, the plains are so vast, and human nature so varied that there are hundreds of interesting subjects yet to be gleaned from the man on the horse with his "devil may care" life, his wonderful vitality and his deep human love, or hate, as the case may be.

"The Cowpuncher's Glove" is only another chapter in his life that is well worth reading. We are first introduced to the Western home of a father and daughter. The cowpuncher enters, and we can easily see that his heart is set upon winning the girl's affection in any way that is possible; but the girl evidently has other views upon the subject, as she does not seem particularly overjoyed at his behavior, although her father practically promises her hand in marriage upon the cowpuncher's return from the roundup. Here we are shown a glimpse of the roundup, and in the next scene we are acquainted with the fact that Jim, the cowpuncher, has not been entirely honest in his dealings and now stands in a fair way of having his neck stretched from the branch of a cedar tree by a lynching gang before morning. This information is communicated to another cowboy by his finding of a glove outside of the county jail window, in which glove is a note from the prisoner imploring the finder, in the name of mercy, to give him a chance to start life over again and be honest.

The stranger does not know the culprit, nor has he an opportunity of seeing him, but moved by the appeal for help he takes the chance, and succeeds in securing the keys of the jail and throwing them in through the barred window to Jim without either man seeing the other. The only reward he has for his service is the pair of gloves, which are initialed, in which he found the note. Slipping them into his pocket he passes on into the night, while Jim, a few moments later, makes his escape without knowing whom or what his benefactor was like.

The cowboy who assisted in Jim's escape afterwards meets the girl of the first scene and wins her love. He does not know that her father has promised her in marriage to Jim until he sees a letter from the latter in which he threatens to come and take her away for his wife that very night. The young lover decides to head off his plan, and the two men meet on a swinging bridge over a dangerous chasm. Here ensues another Edison thriller in the way of a desperate fight, which only terminates when Jim discovers his glove in the possession of his antagonist and the truth is revealed to him that this is the man who saved his life from the lynching gang.

Th final scene is filled with dramatic intensity and splendid action. The lovers are united, and the audience will be found laughing at the quaint situation at the close.

A strong, vital Western picture with befitting backgrounds for the character of its subject.

ESSANAY CO.

"THE TIE THAT BINDS."—Miss May B. Nice, the daughter of a millionaire, through an odd incident, meets young Will Grow, a star reporter on a city daily, and though neither of them press the advantage offered to make an acquaintance, both have been duly infatuated.

In the meantime, May's father and mother have quarreled, and when Mrs. Nice finds the photograph of an actress in her husband's pocket she is enraged and announces that she will immediately take steps to obtain a divorce. The millionaire's protests and appeals fall on deaf ears, and Mrs. Nice hurries sobbing from the room.

Mrs. Nice goes to her sister's, where she relates the story of her husband's awful duplicity. From there she visits the office of her lawyer, states her case, and makes known that she wants a separation.

The scene changes to the newspaper offices, where Grow, the reporter, learns of the contemplated suit for divorce by Mrs. Nice. With instructions to "get the story" from his chief, Will is sent to the Nice mansion, where a dozen or more reporters from other papers have gathered, but fails to gain an admittance.

However, undaunted by a first failure, he searches for a scheme by which he can gain admittance to the Nice home. An opportunity comes when a drunken paperhanger, who has been employed in the Nice household has been discharged by his employer and Will, averring that he is an expert paperhanger, is given the position.

He makes a bad botch of the paper hanging, but obtains the gist of the story when he overhears a conversation between Mr. Nice and his attorney. Will is taking notes when May enters. The two recognize each other and Will is finally forced to confess that he is a reporter.

Despite the girl's pleadings and the father's threats, Will declares he will publish the story, and immediately takes off his overalls and goes to the newspaper office.

May desparingly seeks some plan to bring her father and mother together and thus stave off the unwelcome publicity which will result if Will's story is published. May learns that her mother has gone to her aunt's, and immediately she hastens there. It is not long before the mother is convinced that she acted hastily and is willing to forgive her husband.

An hour later Will, who has deeply regretted the necessity of printing the story, receives the following note:

"I have succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation and so no use for your story. Come to the house at once. May B. Nice."

Later Will learns that, though he has lost a good story, he has won the love of May, and the photoplay ends, with the wife and husband happily reunited and their daughter and her lover plighting their troth.

"CIRCLE C RANCH'S WEDDING PRESENT."—This comedy photoplay is a feature among the Essanay Company's recent Saturday releases, and is one of the most humorous comedies they have ever released.

John Baxter, a prosperous old ranchman, who has never had much learning himself, and who has suddenly become obsessed of the idea to "edicate" his cowboys, hires a young lady in the East to come out and take the crew in hand, and makes announcement of his plan a few days previous to the arrival of the teacher by posting a notice on the door of an old shed which is to serve as the institution of learning.

Little Bill Swipes, the mascot of the crew, is the first to see the notice and hastens off to tell the other boys who, upon investigating for themselves, are loud in denunciation of their employer's whim.

However, when the young lady arrives and Bill and Lariat Pete meet her at the train, both agree that she is some school teacher and the prospect brightens.

School commences and every cowpuncher of the outfit is on hand bright and early to partake of the fruit of knowledge. Bill rings the bell and the pupils take their seats while Miss Gregg instructs them in the profundities of their studies such as spelling "dog," "cat," etc.

Finally the spelling lesson is over and the boys leave, all save Bill, who suddenly finds the teacher in tears over a letter she is reading. Bill hurries out and tells the others of teacher's grief and a ruse is planned by which they can obtain the letter and find out the trouble. It is Bill who gets it and the letter reads: "Dear Daughter: Doctor orders me to change climates if I want to live. Please send me money at once to some out West. Your mother."

Soon the problem is solved when Bill, always taking the initiative, removes his hat and deposits therein his last dollar and invites the others to do the same. A collection sufficient to bring the mother West is finally scraped together, but no word of their plan is imparted to the little school mistress.

Not long after young Billy Baxter, fresh from an Eastern college, arrives home and immediately falls in love with the little school teacher. The proposal is cleverly worked by use of a blackboard and chalk, and the boys of Circle C find them in each other's arms.

A few days later the wedding is announced, but upon the urgent request of the boys it is postponed until a certain wedding present which the boys have in mind arrives.

At the wedding the present is brought forth and proves to be Mrs. Baxter's mother. Nothing is left to complete the little lady's happiness as she throws her arms about her mother's neck and murmurs her gratitude to her former pupils.

NOTE TO EXHIBITORS.—Following is a short description of our western dramatic subject "A Western Woman's Way," which, owing to an unavoidable delay in shipping this film, could not be included in the enclosed issue of the Essanay Guide.

"A WESTERN WOMAN'S WAY."—Release of Saturday, Nov. 26. Big Bill Todd, a worthless wanderer from Dead Horse Camp, falls in with Dick Broadhurst, a young miner. Claiming to be a prospector in hard luck, Todd arouses the sympathy of Broadhurst, who takes him home and stakes him to a good meal and later offers him work as a helper at his mine.

Bill, far from feeling any gratitude to his benefactor, merely takes advantage of the first opportunity to rob Broadhurst and effect his get-away. Seeing Dick display a roll of bills at the time, Todd slips away and shoots him from behind. He robs Broadhurst, who has been badly wounded and makes his escape before the other miners, who have heard the shots, reach the spot.

They at once notify the sheriff, while others of the boys start to carry Broadhurst to his house. Bill Todd, however, has the start of them and reaches there first. He knows that the posse will be on his trail and that unless he is well mounted he cannot escape them. To overcome this, he forges a note to Broadhurst's wife, stating that he has shot a man who was seeking to jump the claim and asking for a horse. He signs Dick Broadhurst's name to this and Mrs. Broadhurst loses no time in giving him the best horse in her husband's string.

However, before he can leave the house the posse arrives and Mrs. Broadhurst hides him and misdirects them. She then helps him to saddle and he rides away. Scarcely has he left, when two of the miners arrive, carrying the wounded Dick. Learning the truth, and realizing that Todd has too much of a start to enable the others to overtake him now, Mrs. Broadhurst acts with characteristic Western expediency.

Seizing a gun, she hastily runs up the side of the mound beside the house. From this elevation Todd is still in sight. It is a long shot, but it finds its mark and the outlaw's cunning has failed, when opposed to the wit and nerve of the miner's wife.

VITAGRAPH CO.

"A WOMAN'S LOVE."—This is an Italian story, showing the constancy of woman's love. What is more appreciated and more easily forgotten than a woman's love?

A young Italian artist, in love with and loved by a sweet country girl, is "discovered" by a gentleman, visiting the home of the young people, to be a genius of great ability and future. He induces the young fellow to go to the city with him to take up the study of art and make a name for himself.

The young fellow goes and becomes a great painter, courted and feted by a large following of admirers. He forgets his country sweetheart, although she keeps a constant watch for his letters and anxiously awaits news of his success or whereabouts.

After a year or more news eventually reaches the poor girl through a newspaper, and then she learns that he has become blind and must lay aside his paint and palette forever. In his blindness he is deserted by his so-called friends and admirers and becomes very poor, but there is one who still loves him and goes to him in his hour of need. The sweetheart of his younger days comes to the city and does not give up her search for him until she finds him, comforts him and takes him back to her home.

A woman's love is unmeasurable and is generally staunchest when a man is weakest; it gives all and never speculates on recompense; her love is its own reward. A stronger and more convincing evidence has never been given than this picture of "A Woman's Love."

"JACK FAT & JIM SLIM AT CONEY ISLAND."—"Whew! Is it hot enough for you, Jim?" "Yes—plenty and a little bit more." This is the beginning of a conversation betwen Jack and Jim as they sit on their respective fire-escapes one hot day in August. Jim is glancing over his newspaper and sees an announcement of a big day at Coney Island. He shows it to Jack, and they decide to beat it for the sands without letting their wives know anything about it. Silently they steal down the ladders, and are soon on their way.

Arriving at the Island, they throw themselves into the fun, which is fast and furious. Their wives discover their absence, find the newspaper, and seeing the flaming announcement of Coney's allurements, guess the cause of their husbands' sudden disappearance and determine to follow them.

Seven feet six inches of attenuated man and five feet of concentrated 350 pounds of fat are enough to attract attention anywhere. Everybody rubbers, and everybody laughs themselves sick when they see the long and the short of it in bathing, riding around on the carousels, on the camel's back, in the "Sugar Bowl," "Down and Out," the "Cake Walk," "Bamboo Slide," and all the rest of the stunt that will upet the dignity of anybody.

To add to the fun the gay benedicts meet a couple of sporty ladies who visit the Island with a diminutive beau, whom they lose sight of in the company of Jack and Jim and who keeps tagging after them like a little poodle dog.

In the midst of their fun their wives come upon them, and a lively chase ensues, but they manage to evade them or keep a lap or two ahead of the poor women all the time. They don't get near them until the two truants have had a large day of it and stop with their lady friends to refresh themselves at the ice cream and soda-water stand. The two wives then take them in hand and march them to their homes, where we see them the next day seated on the fire-escapes recounting their experiences and laughing over the good time they had down at the isle by the sea.

"THE PREACHER'S WIFE."—Rev. Daniel Gwyn, a fine-looking but somewhat austere circuit rider of the country districts, while on his way to fill the pulpit of one of his charges, meets Kate Mackey, a winsome and charming lass, who assists the preacher in watering his horse. He is duly grateful, and at the same time attracted by the comeliness of the girl, and she seems charmed by his manner and bearing.

Upon reaching her home she tells her father about the itinerant minister who will preach at the village church, and they both go to hear him. His preaching is forceful and impressive. After the service Kate and her father take occasion to congratulate him and express their appreciation. At the same time there passes between the preacher and Kate looks that betaken a growing fondness for each other. Kate's father invites the clergyman to his home, and thus he and Kate are thrown into closer relations until he asks her to marry him and the father gives his consent.

After the marriage he shows her he has little, if any, sympathy for the natural feelings and characteristics of his young wife, and she chafes under the restraints he puts upon her, denouncing her love of pretty hats and other things that a young person naturally longs for. The last straw is reached when he snatches from her hands a book she is reading and throws it into the fire.

She leaves her husband. On her way from her home she meets a young fellow, who notices her disturbed mind and pretends to sympathize with her and offers to help her. She writes her father about the intolerance and severity of her husband and the step she has taken. Her old dady finds her, takes her home, and once more she is his companion and comfort.

Her husband discovers her absence, and learns the reasons for deserting him, then realizes that in his anxiety for his own salvation he was entirely blind to the happiness of others, and his severity has destroyed that which he so much cherished—the love of his wife.

He hastens to make amends and ask for forgiveness. He goes to his father-in-law's home, confesses his narrowness and fanaticism, pleads with his wife to return to him and he will show that consideration, and give her that love and liberty to which she is entitled. She consents to forgive him, feeling assured that he has learned a lesson not soon to be forgotten, and bringing him to a realization of the love and kindness which draw people unto Him whose gospel he preaches.

PLANS FOR MOTION PICTURE THEATRES.

Strange as it may seem to experienced motion picture exhibitors, it is nevertheless a fact that many theatres are erected in which the operating booth is an after thought. Mr. J. H. Hallberg, the "Economizer" man, told the writer of a case over in New Jersey where the theatre was finished and the exhibitor then asked where he should locate the booth, and "Believe me," said Mr. Hallberg, "he was obliged to do considerable scheming in order to place the booth so as to project a picture properly."

In this connection, Mr. Hallberg informed the writer that he is every day in receipt of letters from prospective exhibitors asking for his advice in the building and arrangement of the equipment. Where he simply acts as consulting engineer, of course Mr. Hallberg charges for his services, but where his advice and experience is called for in connection with the sale of an equipment, no extra charge is made. Too much stress cannot be laid to the importance of getting started right in the motion picture business and saving the necessity of later changes. Intending exhibitors will do well to avail themselves of Mr. Hallberg's well known thoroughness and the fact that he is in a position to furnish complete equipments.

C. F. Goodrich, owner of the Royal theatre, at Green Bay, Wis., and the Bijou at Menominee, Mich., passed through the city last week on his way home, after attending his mother's funeral at the old home in Michigan. Mr. Goodrich is enlarging the seating capacity of the Royal, so that it will accommodate 150 more people. He reports excellent business at both houses.

Edison type B machine, returned from a trip to Kentucky last week. He reports business very fine in his line and that he sold a machine to every person called on during his stay.

The Broadway, a new theatre built by Elias Jones, in Lincoln, Ill., will be opened Monday, Nov. 28. Mr. Jones visited the General Film Co., at 77 South Clark street, the past week, and arranged for his service and purchased the necessary outfit.

L. Jarodski will open his new theatre in Danville, Ill., Monday, Nov. 28. He arranged with the General Film., at 77 South Clark street, for a high class service last week, and also purchased a machine and supplies.

T. M. Ditman, owner and manager of the Ravenswood theatre, 4525 East Ravenswood Park, was seen last week and was all smiles over the business done. Manager Ditman always decorates the front of his theatre when he has a strong feature film, and his patrons, who are highly cultured, know that he has something specially good when they see the mass of colors out in front. He made an unusually fine front display for "Abraham Lincoln's Clemency," Saturday, Nov. 19, and turned large numbers away. The Ravenswood seats only 250 people.

D. E. Rice, owner and manager of the Grand theatre in Calumet, and of the Lyric, Ishpeming, both towns being in Michigan, was a visitor last week at the offices of the General Film Co., 85 Dearborn street. Manager Rice formerly obtained service from the Western Film Exchange of Milwaukee, but has now arranged with the General Film Co. to book both his houses.

What almost amounts to an impossibility is sometimes requested from motion picture machine supply houses. For example, the Kleine Optical Co., of Chicago, recently received an order for a projecting lens that would produce a stereopticon picture 4 feet wide, at a distance of 95 feet. While the projecting distance is not out of the ordinary ,the size of the picture is, and the manager of the lens department evolved an adjustable lens that would produce a 4 foot picture anywhere between 63 and 113 feet. This he did by applying the principles of a photographic tele-photo objective to a projecting lens.

J. C. Deagan of this city is widely known among exhibitors as an expert manufacturer of musical bells, for use in motion picture theatres. Many exhibitors have installed a set of these bells and have found that additional pleasure has been given their patrons thereby. See the Deagan advertisement on another page in this issue.

MOTION PICTURES IN TUBERCULOSIS FIGHT.

a prize for the Red Cross stamp design, and the winning has brought her the hundred dollars to pay the fee at the art school. Happy in her good fortune, she hastens to tell the poor woman next door and hears the verdict of the doctor. Here is a new and greater need for her money, and she bravely gives up her ambitions in order to save a human life. Putting the money in an envelope marked "From a Friend," she slips it under the door of the poor woman's apartment and goes back to her own room for a good cry. The advertisement of the art school, which she has kept before her all this while, is taken down and torn up.

The young millionaire, who has picked up an acquaintance with the girl by this time, happens in and see what has happened, but doesn't get a very clear explanation of the girl's sudden change of plan until the woman next door enters to tell of her good fortune in finding the money; then the young man knows what has happened. This is a sort of revelation to him and opens to him a field of usefulness that he had not dreamed of before. Acting upon the suggestion, he engages a Red Cross nurse, and soon a transformation is effected in the squalid quarters. The sick boy is also taken to the hospital for treatment.

All this is shown in the pictures, which include a view of the roof of the Vanderbilt clinic where tubercular patients are treated.

To conclude the love story, the girl gets a message summoning her to the home of the young man on Fifth Avenue. The time is Christmas, and while she is standing under a spray of mistletoe the young man makes that his excuse for kissing her; but there is no concealing the fact that he has another reason, which proves quite agreeable to the girl after she realizes that he is the acquaintance of the slums. A final scene shows the Red Cross stamp design for this year, and, by double exposure, a very pretty kissing scene.

This picture will be employed extensively in New York and elsewhere by the Red Cross to push the sale of its stamps this year. A number of meetings for that purpose have already been arranged in different parts of the city. The officers of the several societies interested have expressed thir grat dlight with the picture, and unusual results are expected.

WANTS PICTURES OF WALRUS HERD SENT TO PRESIDENT.

B. B. Dobbs, of Seattle, Wash., who took a motion picture of a herd of 10,000 walrus in Bering Sea, from the deck of the schooner Helen Johnson, has been asked by Attorney-General Wickersham, by wire, to go to Washington and show the pictures to President W. H. Taft.

It is said that Dobb's pictures of this huge herd, which was so dense that the schooner changed its course, and that the snap shots of the polar bears on the icebergs will become the property of the American Museum of Natural History of New York.

The old Weast Theatre, on Fulton street, Peoria, Ill., will now be devoted entirely to motion pictures and high class vaudeville. The new lessees of the house are Sandy McGill, Wiley Bracket, Charles Nathan and Felix Greenberg. Mr. Greenberg will manage the house.

Nathan Goldberg and Max White House have purchased the Star theatre, Greenville, N. Y., and will run motion pictures in the future. The managers will eliminate vaudeville.

THE WEARING QUALITY of a Motion Picture Machine is next in importance to Quality of Pictures. Nothing is more annoying than a breakdown, and that's what you're liable to get where the wearing quality has not been demonstrated by years of service.

G. B. JONES, of Lawrence, Kansas, says, Nov. 6, 1910: "The Motiograph is a strictly superior machine. Its main beauty is that it is dependable. I have never had a breakdown with a Motiograph."

The

gives the best pictures and the greatest durability, and requires the least attention.

The Life of a Motion Picture Machine for Electric Theatre work has been estimated at two years. Motiographs, after three years of steady, constant grind, are considered by the owners practically good as new. They have solid steel wheels, tool steel shafts, phosphor bronze bushings.
Motiograph pictures are known for their brilliancy, steadiness and freedom from flicker.
The patented double cone shutter is largely responsible.

A MELIES INDIAN DRAMA

"What Great Bear Learned" Is a Powerful Story of Indian Life

(Subject of First Page Illustration.)

THE old saying runs: "All is fair in love and war," but when we go into it we must take our chances.

In a western town a venturous Mexican beauty is in love with a young Mexican of rather doubtful scruples, for whom she is willing to do anything, although she knows he is dishonest and deceitful (such is the way of women).

Her lover is playing cards with a group of cowboys and, in order to win the "stakes," cheats by means of having his beauty pass him an extra card. She is caught doing this and the cowboys cover the pair with their revolvers. They seize the Mexican and are for lynching him, but by the cajoling entreaties of the girl they allow him to go, with the provision, however, that he never return to that country again.

The pair shift as best they can in the wilds of the country round about. While near a river the Mexican discovers a band of Indians washing gold and straightway rushes to his enamorita to inform her of the fact and plan some way of obtaining this precious metal.

"Great Bear" is the chief of this band of Indians whom the girl has met in her wanderings. To him she goes with the intention of obtaining information as to the whereabouts of the gold. She pretends to love him and he finally reveals to her the hiding place. The Indian's wife happens along and is shocked to find the Mexican woman in the arms of her husband. The chief throws her aside and continues to believe in this new love, but the squaw has her suspicions, spies on the Mexicans and discovers a plot to steal their gold. She rushes back to the band with this news and the Indians arrive upon the scene just in time to prevent the schemers from escaping. "Great Bear" learns the truth and challenges the Mexican to a duel. In a firece struggle the chief wounds his antagonist. The Indians tie him to his horse and put the woman on the horse and command them to go, warning them never to return.

"Great Bear" is overcome. He stands dejected before his wife, but this little woman acted out of pure love for him and willingly takes him back and forgives.

TERMINAL THEATRE SOLD.

The Terminal Theatre in Cauley Hall, near Sullivan Square, Charlestown, Mass., opened for the season, under new management, November 12. While the general admission is a "dime," on Saturday afternoons the management will cut the price to 5 cents for women and children. It is the purpose of the manager to give mostly educational pictures at that performance.

The program will be changed every Monday, Wednesday and Friday, with special pictures for the Saturday matinee. Between the pictures Mr. Siller, a Boston tenor, will sing some popular songs, he will be assisted by Miss Smith, formerly of the Orpheum Photoplay Theatre, Boston.

NICKEL THEATRE, MONTREAL.

The accompanying photo represents one of the most progressive motion picture houses in Eastern Canada—"The Nickel." Its program always consists of refined and unoffensive pictures, and its patronage is of the very best. Some of the good points of this theatre are good pictures, courteous treatment to patrons, no packed aisles, and everybody a comfortable seat. The electric signs in the cut were made by the Denis Advertising Signs, Limited, of this city and are worked on the flasher principle.

FOOTBALL GAME ON LANTERN SLIDES.

For the first time in the history of the photoplay theatre we have a football game in pictures. The Levi Company of New York has released for this week's "Current Event" a series of pictures of the Yale-Harvard football game. The set consists of sixteen or eighteen lantern slides of the most important plays of that fierce struggle on the gridiron. Each picture depicts a turning point in the game and shows with remarkable clearness the many interesting scenes of that popular contest that has created widespread newspaper notoriety.

Because of the great interest everyone has in college sports, this "Event" release should be an attraction in any picture theatre.

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK

Scott & Van Altena.

"WHEN I GATHERED THE MYRTLE WITH MARY."—Words by Will A. Heelan; music by Seymour Furth; published by The Jos. Morris Co, New York. Both the lyrics and composition of this selection will readily indicate to any music lover that it is out of the ordinary in every respect, and entirely distinct from the general run of popular songs. That Scott & Van Altena should produce an appropriately beautiful set of slides is to be expected; and, forsooth is true.

"I WOULDN'T GIVE MY HEART TO ANYONE BUT YOU."—Words by Edgar Leslie; music by Ben Edwards; published by Leo Feist, New York. Honest, Mr. Exhibitor, we'll have to give either Mr. Scott or Mr. Van Altena (neither will confess) credit for a discerning eye for beauty. If, after seeing this set of slides, you wouldn't gladly give your heart to the most model model therein, why then, dast it, the drinks are on us. Then, too, it is a novelty set. Ten novelty slides a la S. & V. in one set will make you sit up and take notice to say the least.

"COME AWAY, LITTLE GIRL."—Words by Al. Bryan; music by Geo. W. Meyer; published by F. B. Haviland Pub. Co., New York. A love ballad with well set, well executed, appropriate illustrations by Scott & Van Altena.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"YOU ARE THE LIGHT OF MY LIFE."—Published by F. B. Haviland Pub. Co. A high class ballad of the better class; bound to please any audience. It would surprise one not well versed in photography how at this time of year Wheeler is able to get the most beautiful summer scenery for his backgrounds. Old boy Boreas doesn't bother this producer's work at all, for the latter "puts one over" on nature and gives us green leaves, beautiful flowers and superb lawns in November. How does he do it? Well, it took him fifteen years to discover a perfect method. The finished goods he gives to you of the song slide world, but the secret is rightfully his.

"TAKE ME BACK TO DEAR OLD DIXIE."—Words and music by R. M. Stults; published by F. B. Haviland Pub. Co. A timely song, so far removed from the everyday love ballad that it is refreshing. Lyrics and melody are both treated in a pleasing manner. This is a pictorial set of slides containing many beautiful views of the South and Southerners. Even the piccaninnies among the cotton are to be found in these illustrations.

"LOU."—Words and music by Dave Kaplan and Joe Samuels; published by Billy Watson Music Pub. Co. A dainty little love ballad, well treated both in theme and melody. Slides that treat the love theme masterly are posed before a background of beautiful lakes, and are finished with a moonlight effect that lends softness and charm.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"THAT'S THE FELLOW I WANT TO GET."—Words by Alfred Bryan; music by Geo. W. Meyer; published by the House of Haviland. The story is of a mischievous kid who catches the ice man kissing his ma. He wants to get even, so procures germs from a druggist and gives them to a string of people, finally reaching the ice man, and that's the one he's after. The amusing scenes are cleverly depicted by Simpson.

"KELLY'S GONE TO KINGDOM COME."—Words by Sax Rohmer; music by T. W. Thurban; published by Will Rossiter. The song that Maude Lambert, the dainty comedienne, featured in Lew Fields' "Midnight Sons." In the slides Simpson has shown a real areoplane, Kelly under the ocean, Kelly in an airship, and any number of humorous situations. Most of these pictures were made during the recent International Aviation Meet.

Levi Company, Inc.

"DIXIE ROSE."—Words and music by Dave Reed; published by Shapiro. Here is a great song with a beautiful melody. In discussing this number the publisher claims that from present indications it will become the season's biggest hit, and that he intends to go after it for all it is worth. A statement like this from Mr. Shapiro is sufficient in itself to show the true value of the song, and when he says he is going after it it is as good as made. The slides are fine and in keeping with the excellent work the Levi Co. are now turning out.

"I CAN'T LIVE WITHOUT YOU."—Words by Paul Hamilton; music by Harry Jasper; published by Jerome H. Remick. A simple little waltz ballad with a bewitching melody. Easy to play and easy to sing, consequently should become very popular with all song slide singers. The slides are perfect, good looking models and clever love poses. A very good number.

Excelsior Slide Co.

"ALL OVER TOWN."—Words by Al. Thahern; music by Percy Wenrich; published by F. A. Mills, New York. The lyrics tell of a rumor that flies around town of the marriage of a popular young lady to "one of the boys." She is "kidded" very much about it, as one can readily see in these illustrations. An aeroplane novelty in this set gives a clever rendering of the line "all over town."

"SPRINGTIME BRINGS ROSES AND YOU."—Words and music by Kendis & Paley, and published by them. The two authors were for many years with Shapiro, but have now branched out into the publishing business under their own name. The illustrations for this song show a marked improvement in this firm's production, which, if kept up, is bound to be fruitful. We refer especially to artistic coloring.

PUBLIC APPRECIATION.

It is not always easy to convince that powerful critic, the "Public," of the worth of something offered for its consideration, but once it understands that it is being dealt with fairly and honestly, and that a really meritorious article is waiting for approval, the endorsement given is spontaneous and generous.

The Motiograph has probably had an easier time than most innovations in securing public recognition, because of its unusual features, and its manufacturers realize keenly how fully the public appreciates the many points of advantageous excellence the Motiograph possesses.

This appreciation is shown every day by the many reports telling how much benefit the users are deriving from the Motiograph, and how highly it is prized as an economical and effective machine, so the Enterprise people have reason to feel that the "Public" is certainly their friends.

WILL MEET AT CHITTENDEN HOTEL.

Instead of meeting at the Southern Hotel, Columbus, O., Dec. 5, as was reported in a recent issue of The Film Index, the Exhibitors' League of Ohio will meet at the Chittenden Hotel at the same given date.

"PALS"

Released Thursday Dec. 1st

Length about 950 feet

There is something of the real sort about this picture that makes us feel the strength of real frendship and the vileness of its enemies. One of two men, who are partners in a mine, is called home suddenly. Leaving the camp hurriedly, he lays a note for his "pal" explaining his departure. A Mexican "greaser" enters the cabin, steals their gold and substitutes a note saying that the partner, becoming tired of work has gone and taken the gold. The other partner believes it and there follows a wonderful dramatic scene when the two meet in the United States. This is a story of western life you cannot afford to miss.

Released Thursday, December 8th. Length about 950 feet

Reggie was a hall-room boy in love with Celestina, whose papa was worth a few millions. When Reggie was invited to Celestina's fine country home he pressed his other pair of trousers and prepared to "make a good front." But luck was against him. A freshly painted bench on which he sat, an accidental exchange of suit cases with a bibulous tramp and a misunderstanding with Celestina's papa give Reggie plenty of trouble. He gets out of it, though, and wins Celestina besides. This is a continuous laugh.

LEADING AMERICAN EXPONENT OF THE PHOTOPLAY

Published Weekly by the Films Publishing Co., at No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City

"THE COUNTY FAIR" REPRODUCED IN PICTURES

Famous American Comedy Drama, Great Theatrical Success, Splendidly and Faithfully Produced by the Selig Polyscope Company

BY JAMES S. McQUADE

AT the very outset, I am confident in promising exhibitors a roaring big treat in "The County Fair," a full length feature film that will be released by the Selig Co., December 15. I got such enjoyment out of a private exhibition of this film that I wish to pass it along, so that as wide publicity as possible can be given in advance.

For "ripping" fine action, clever comedy work and dramatic strength, I can commend "The County Fair" to everyone who has a fit of the blues. It stimulates like a breeze from the mountains and brings back the light-heartedness of youth with its joyous laughter. At least that has been my experience, and it will be that of everyone (not irreclaimably lost in the gloom of melancholia) who views this film in operation. All of which may seem extravagant praise; but I only enthuse when heartily stirred up.

As was stated in my Chicago letter several weeks ago, Mr. Wm. N. Selig purchased the rights and stage effects—mechanical and otherwise—of the "Neal Burgess County Fair" from the Burgess estate, through Sanger & Jordan, of New York City, for the production of this film. That was nearly six months ago, and, in the interim, at convenient periods, the various sections of the film have been negatived.

The mechanical apparatus employed by Burgess in the famous horse race scene not being considered sufficiently realistic, an actual equine contest of speed, on a real race track and given at a real county fair, was substituted. Advantage was taken of the County fair, held at Galena, Ill., one week last summer, to produce this section of the film, the members of Selig's Eastern stock company employed in the cast being transported thither, with the indispensable camera squad and the producer.

And I can assure the reader that this horse race in Selig's "County Fair" is a hummer and the real thing. Then you have the grand stand and the judges' stand, and a clear view of the horses in the get-away, in the first quarter, the half and in the final dash. To watch the thronged and excited spectators in the grand stand, at the finish, more especially those characters interwoven in the story, makes you feel inclined to jump to your feet, wave your hat frantically, and whoop her up generally. It surely is a horse race scene that will go down as a masterpiece in the history of picture production.

The splendid photography, which marks this film throughout, will increase the pleasure of everyone who sees it run off.

IN THE GRAND STAND.

Popular as the old dramatic production of the "Neal Burgess County Fair" has been, I question if it afforded, in its long years of prosperity, more delightful or more pleasurable entertainment than the Selig "County Fair" is destined to furnish picture lovers. This film should be extensively and painstakingly heralded in all possible ways. The unique and attractive novelty streamers gotten up by the Selig Polyscope Co. for this feature film should be used liberally by every exhibitor.

The opening scene shows us the beaming substantial form of Otis Tucker, who has been courting the dear old spinster, Miss Abbey, for 14 long years, but who has never had the courage to pop the question. He is in a real estate office and learns with great mental perturbation that the Abbey farm is for sale. Forthwith he takes the train asd soon arrives at the old New England homestead.

He is warmly welcomed by the be-ringleted Miss Abbey and pretty Sally Greenaway whom the elder lady has adopted. Soon afterwards two waifs from the Bowery, New York, appear on the scene. They are Tim and "Taggs," sent by the commanding officer of a Salvation Mission in New York, to the good hearted spinster for employment.

"Taggs" is another "Topsy," full of girlish pranks and side splitting antics. She presents the letter recommending herself and Tim, and shocks the finical, prim old maid by keeping her hat on and chewing gum with an industry that threatens dislocation of the jaws. Aunt Abbey finally adjusts matters by snatching the offending hat from the matted head and by dislodging the gum forcibly from between the rapidly working teeth. Then there is wrath and dismay, for the "horrid stuff" sticks like glue and besmears both hands in wavy streaks. Sally, however, relieves the situation by taking off "Taggs" to her room.

Otis, fearing for Tim after such a trial of Aunt Abbey's temper, takes him away to the stables, the lad being recommended as having a good knowledge of horses. There the boy recognizes a thoroughbred among the horses and shortly afterwards tries him out with great satisfaction.

In the meantime Otis has returned to the house and proposed to Aunt Abbey, the happy consummation of his hopes being blasted by the mischievous "Taggs," who impishly comes to the scene, just as the lovers are about to embrace. Otis shows that marriage is the only way open to lift the $1,500 mortgage on the farm, as the lady refuses to accept a loan.

Next we see constable Hammerhead, who has come to serve dispossession papers on Miss

CASUAL COMMENT

'TIS an awful affliction to be bereft of the saving sense of humor. The other day "Puck," a widely known "funny paper," which lampoons the foibles of good, bad and indifferent and is no respector of persons or things, took a hack at motion pictures in a cartoon.

The Dear Old Ladies of the Moving Picture World were very properly horrified because of the sacreligiousness of the "funny little fellow" and seriously proceeded to call him to account.

Having administered so salutary a castigation to the ribald "Puck," it was to be hoped that the Moving Picture World had earned the approval of all interested in the welfare of motion pictures. Imagine our surprise upon reading in the columns of The Dramatic Mirror the following slighting, almost offensive allusion to the serious efforts of our esteemed contemporary:

> Poor "Puck!" He is entitled to our sympathetic tears. He got himself in for a spanking administered by those fatherly fellows who run the "Moving Picture World." It appears that "Puck" (it is the illustrated humorous weekly that is referred to) published recently a two-page cartoon attack on motion pictures, illustrating the vicious and unspeakable character of these devilish inventions and their horrifying influence on the innocent youth of our land, said cartoon being based on the popular belief entertained by those wise people who, never having seen a picture show, know all about them. The nature of the cartoon need not, therefore, be described. The offense, it will be admitted, was great, and such as we might expect from an unruly little chap like "Puck," who is best when he confines himself to laughter. But to be chastised, lambasted and warned hereafter to be good in the terifying manner of the giant ogres of the "Moving Picture World" is a punishment too great—it is cruelty, nothing less.
> There should be no doubt about what "Puck" will do in this matter. He will come whimpering to the knees of his masters with the "amende" demanded. He will, at least, if he knows when he is well off. He is probably right now cringing and trembling in rear at their office door, and what is more, he will never dare offend again. Let the motion picture people the world over rest easy on that score. Their watchful guardians, the editors of the "Moving Picture World," the special stewards of their welfare, as it were, have seen to it that "Puck" shall never again have the temerity to brave their just anger and resentment. Let us pity poor "Puck," but let us at the same time sing praises and thanks to the stern and powerful champions who have selected themselves to safeguard the welfare of motion pictures.

"Giant Ogres," indeed. We fear the Dear Old Ladies of the Moving Picture World have fallen in parlous times that their conscientious efforts to defend the honor of the industry, of which they are the voluntary chaperones, should arouse such slighting comment. As the ever ready champions of the down trod The Film Index would remark to The Dramatic Mirror: Quit your "spoofing"; this is no occasion for levity.

BUT let The Dramatic Mirror looks to its laurels; a nemesis is on its trail. For some time The Film Index has held to the opinion that The Mirror was the only general amusement publication that printed unbiased criticisms of motion pictures; also, that its comments upon current pictures were intelligent and helpful to the picture producers.

That, we repeat, has long been our opinion; but it seems that we have been mistaken all along. The grievous error into which we have fallen is now pointed out by another amusement journal which announces that it is about to "institute a department for review and comment" of pictures, which will be "viewed by a competent judge of the relative merits in motion pictures." The journal in question admits that it has "not the slightest doubt that this plan will meet with instant and widespread approval," because it marks another step on the part of that publication "in advance of all other publications which devote space to pictures"; also, because all others are pikers, or words to that effect.

REGARDING the journal in question the editor of The Film Index has a well-defined opinion which has been expressed privately on many occasions when such information was solicited by prospective advertisers, and, so far as we have been informed, that opinion has proved to be correct. Far be it from us, then, to say there is no place for our unnamed contemporary in the motion picture field, but it should come with clean hands and a nobler purpose than is revealed in its announcement.

THERE be those still alive among the picture men who remember that laconic message from the publisher of our unnamed contemporary bidding them to "go to h—l" when he was invited to foregather with them. Since then, some three years ago, the bitter pill of envy and disappointment has been griping his guts. Unable to longer endure the pain of separation from profit and prestige, lost through his own stupidity to other publications more progressive and more intelligently managed than his own, this once disdainful publisher now hangs out the white flag of surrender. If the mountain will not come to Mahomet, then will Mahomet go to the mountain.

Intelligent, conscientious reviews and constructive criticism of motion picture subjects may, in time, earn for this publisher and his paper the reward he seeks. But his declaration does not ring true. We fear for the result, for the stream seems to be muddied at its source. The Film Index wishes him and his paper success in the undertaking, nevertheless, for the cause of motion pictures will not suffer by the acquisition of friendly journalistic effort; but this particular publisher and his assistants will profit if they will take a few leaves from the books of their more intelligent, more progressive and more experienced contemporaries, whose efforts they affect to despise.

WE were greatly amused and edified upon reading in the Moving Picture World an extended criticism of a Powers "independent" picture, entitled "When the World Sleeps." The criticism was written by one of the editors of our esteemed contemporary who, lest it should be forgotten, reminds the reader that he was once a dramatic critic, a producer, a playwright, an author and "all the rest of it" (which must mean the actors and the incidental music); all of which, he claims, is his warrant for his presumption in writing about it at all, and which leaves us no possible excuse by which to explain how he came to write that which was written by him.

Do you get it?

Now, this astute critic proceeds to "knock the block" off that particular picture by pointing out how utterly silly and mechanical the whole plot is—a singular characteristic of the great majority of "independent" pictures. If he had stopped at that he would have uttered but the simple truth, but in the course of his ruminations he utters this:

> The Powers picture plays are increasing in favor in the moving picture field, because they are improving in consistent good qualities; the photography is improving; the settings are improving; the acting is improving. In fact, quietly and without ostentation, the Powers picture plays have forged right to the very head of the Independent product. And frankly, of their kind, I do not think a better picture is made in this country. * * * This play was finely acted, finely staged and finely photographed.

We say this "While the World Sleeps" picture and found it to be a complete and emphatic refutation of everything that is claimed for the Powers pictures in the foregoing paragraph. A Pathe picture run immediately after it served to emphasize and to clinch the refutation.

We do not pretend to see many "independent" pictures—one now and then holds us for a long time; but if "When the World Sleeps" is a good sample of the Powers product, and the Powers product is the best "of the kind" made in this country, what, in heaven's name, are the rest of the "independent" pictures like?

Any reader of The Film Index who imagines he is missing something by not running "independent" pictures will be satisfied to "wear the shackles of the trust" after seeing this picture.

LAYING aside the merits—or demerits—of the picture itself, we must point out the fact that the critic of the Moving Picture World has utterly failed to discern the true motif of the subject of his lengthy criticism. To elucidate:

> Man gets telegram saying he must send brokers $5,000 in the morning or be wiped out. Wife sees telegram and is deeply distressed. Friend comes to stay all night; has $5,000, which husband puts in safe. Wife walks in sleep and takes money out of safe. Next morning friend wants money—it's gone. Friend gets detective. Next night wife again walks in sleep and puts money back in safe. Friend, husband and detective see her do it. Mystery solved. Picture ends.

Here's the criticism of the M. P. World editor:

> There is nothing impossible in "When the World Sleeps." Its faults are faults of construction. Let me offer a suggestion. It was not necessary for the husband to be short $5,000 for the success of the play. Eliminate that incident and you have a perfectly feasible drama.

The critic is wrong: Eliminate the incident of the husband being short $5,000 and the reason for the wife's somnambulistic exploit is eliminated. There is a psychological suggestion, a telepathic communication betwen the husband and wife—she with knowledge of his financial stress and access to the safe; he with a desire to take the $5,000—result wife in her sleep tries to help him out of trouble. Next day disturbance about lost money operates psychologically to influence her to put it back. That is the only explanation of the wife's somnambulism, for it does not appear that she is a chronic sleep-walker. If she was the psychological suggestion would still be necessary to impel her to do that particular act. So we fear that the astute critic will have to make a further demand upon his experience to evolve a "perfectly feasible drama" from this hodge-podge of a plot.

NO USE FOR BOOKLETS

Editor The Film Index.

Dear Sir:—In your issue of November 12th we see that your Chicago correspondent writes on the opportunity for the manufacturers to cut out their advertising booklets and replace them by bulletin or leaflet.

We give great importance to our lobby display and think that it is the best advertising for the theatres. There has been a decided change in the moving picture business everywhere for the past two years, and this change is felt in a way that the exhibitors are taking care of their lobby display. The A. B. C. posters have been a great help to the exhibitors. We have a special department taking care of the posters and we keep all our theatres supplied with them all the time, but there is nothing that draws the public to the theatres like the story of the film itself published in the lobby.

We use the Association films exclusively, and there is not one of the Association manufacturers who are publishing leaflets of this kind. I believe it would be to their great interest to be the first to introduce the general use of them. The booklet and advertising matter which they are sending to their exhibitors at present are perfectly useless, as we find all the particulars we want in The Film Index, and their pamphlets and advertising matter generally go in the paper basket.

There should be a poster of about ten by twelve, made with the story of the subject and some cuts or photographs taken from the film, and you would see that all the exhibitors would get busy and have frames made that size and it would help them a great deal.

Yours for the good of the business,
Starland Limited,
Paul Le Maquam, President.
Winnipeg, Man.

ASK THE MANUFACTURERS

Editor The Film Index.

Dear Sir:—Can you tell me why the majority of the manufacturers prefer to spend useless coin by mailing us exhibitors fancy little booklets when we would send them a vote of thanks for just a plain little one-sheet like the Biograph and Lubin, Kalem and Melies, so we can paste them up in our front for the public to read—we read The Index. People nowadays want to see and read what you are going to show them—a word to the wise ought to be sufficient.—M. G. Perrin, Mgr. Lyric Theatre, Evansville, Ind. (about four years in business—same place).

PHOTOPLAY THEATRE REOPENS

The Clemeny photoplay theatre, Broadway, Dover, N. H., the first house of its kind in that city, which was opened about two years ago, was reopened Thanksgiving night, under the management of A. E. Williams, a well known theatrical man.

During the summer the house has been practically rebuilt and put in first class condition. The new management is running the best of motion pictures and vaudeville at prices that will assure the same. At the performance Thanksgiving night, the house was crowded at both performances.

Commissioner of Licenses Oliver Complains in Letter of Improper Use of His Department by Some Lighting Concern

That some concern is making improper use of a recent order to the exhibitors of New York City by Commissioner of Licenses Oliver to light up their theatres is evident by the following communication, issued by that official last week:

Mayor's Office,
Bureau of Licenses,
City Hall, New York.
Nov. 25, 1910.

Sir: I am in receipt of some printed advertisements issued by persons engaged in the business of selling devices for the lighting up of moving picture theatres, which are worded in such a way, or which by the use of the official letter head of this office, make it appear that the officials of this bureau desire that all motion picture shows adopt these devices for use in their premises.

I trust that your dealings heretofore with this bureau are sufficient in themselves to refute any statements or insinuations that the officials of this bureau are in any way concerned with the conduct of your private affairs.

I consider the purchase of your supplies and apparatus entirely your private business.

In regard to the lighting apparatus, I beg to inform you explicitly that we do not care whether your show house is lit up with a patent device or one of your own making. It makes no difference whether the device is costly or cheap. All that is necessary is to light up the halls while the pictures are being shown. It does not make any difference how you do it.

I wish this to be particularly understood, for I do not wish you to be imposed upon by any persons claiming that they are acting with the sanction of this bureau in offering to sell their goods to you. Nor do I wish this bureau misrepresented by having you believe that we could engage in such a wretched enterprise.

We have not approved or disapproved of any lighting device or any other kind of a device to be used in a motion picture show house. We want you to feel absolutely free to choose whichever apparatus is suited to your means and fancy, and do not wish you to make your choice with the fear of prejudicing yourself in the eyes of this office.

We wish you to freely feel that our assistance and advice is always at your disposal, and that we would not in any way go beyond our official duties in supervising the conduct of your show house.

Respectfully,
FRANCIS V. S. OLIVER, JR.,
Chief of Bureau.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS MEET

Exhibitors Association is Addressed by Commissioner of Licenses Oliver and Others

An informal meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of New York City was held Monday night, Nov. 28, at Driscoll's "Nicoland" Theatre, 161st street and Third avenue, New York City. About two hundred members attended and listened to an interesting programme of speeches and entertainment.

Francis V. S. Oliver, Jr., Chief of the Bureau of Licenses, Mayor's office, was the main speaker of the evening. He touched upon the censorship of films, the value of lighted houses and the unsettled condition of the exhibition business in New York City. The chief's views on censorship have been given at length in these columns before. Regarding existing conditions, however, he expressed himself in favor of an ordinance that should establish a "uniform set of laws," that should determine and embody under one head the laws of the various city departments as they apply to the picture theatre. Under present conditions the authority of the license, fire and building departments often conflict and place the exhibitor in the predicament of not knowing where he stands.

Naturally, the exhibitors would favor the successful enactment of such an ordinance, and the suggestion, coming, as it did, from the lips of a city official, has bound together those who were formerly rivals, with one accord—to improve their business conditions.

Other speakers were Robert T. Luce, counsel to the association; F. H. Richardson and several others.

A number of interesting demonstrations of various picture apparatuses were given, including an elaborate exhibition of the Simpson Solar Screen, which is in use in the "Nicoland."

HALLBERG WILL PUBLISH BOOK

In a letter to The Film Index, Mr. J. H. Hallberg, author of "Electrical Talks," writes that he is in receipt of numerous inquiries from theatre managers, of which the following is a good sample:

Have been very much interested in your "ELECTRICAL TALKS" in the Film Index, but have lost most copies of same.

Kindly advise if these "TALKS" have been, or will be published in book form, and how soon I will be able to get one.

Thanking you in advance for the favor of a prompt reply, and wishing you much success in your good work, I am, Yours very truly, (Signed Elbert Lowery,
The Bonita, Columbus, Ga.

Mr. Hallberg wishes to say in reply to this and similar inquiries that it is his intention to publish the "Electrical Talks" in book form as soon as the series has been completed in The Film Index. This will be welcome news to those who have lost any instalment of the articles. Such a book will be of great value to picture theatre managers.

WHY?

An exhibitor at Westminster, Md., wants to ask a few questions in the paper so that the manufacturers will see them. He begins with this one:

"Why do the exhibitors have to pay for posters?"

The others are much the same.

The exhibitor seems to have the impression that the manufacturer of anything ought to furnish the posters to advertise that thing. Under some conditions that is the rule, as in the case of patent medicines and food products. But in such cases the article to be sold and the method of selling and profit taking are quite different from pictures and picture theatres.

Probably the best reason for the present method is that the cost of free posters is greater than any manufacturer could stand. Another reason is that things which are given away are seldom put to their proper use. Manufacturers of shoes and other things tried this once and found out that less than ten per cent. of the posters which they gave to retail dealers were ever used. Then they charged the retail dealers for those posters and they were posted. The same would be true of the picture posters.

As it is now, the exhibitor who is really in earnest and wants to advertise his photoplay house is glad of the chance to buy posters and pictures of photoplays and to use them to the best advantage. At present manufacturers are making posters at a loss.

LUNA AND ISIS THEATRES CHANGE HANDS

The Luna and Isis theatres, Salt Lake City, Utah, which have been controlled by Max Florence, passed into the hands of the new proprietors on Nov. 19. These gentlemen are J. B. Ashton, F. A. Ball and O. Embry, and they will make a number of improvements in these motion picture playhouses. The first innovation at the Luna is the securing of a man from New York who will, at each performance, deliver a lecture illustrated with pictures on lights and shadows of New York. At the Isis the Speery Sisters have been secured. One of the young ladies has a perfect baritone voice and the other is a high soprano.

WASHINGTON TIMES INVESTIGATION

By James F. Mackin, Pastor St. Paul's Catholic Church.

The motion picture, like all modern inventions, may be a most useful instrument or a most terrible scourge.

In the hands of intelligent educators it may be made to illustrate science, religion, history, and travel, as no other agency can. But for this it needs also intelligent and conscientious supervision.

In the hands of selfish mercenaries it will become a potent engine for destruction of the faith and morals of the young, and here, in my opinion, the greatest danger lies.

The effort made by The Washington Times to ascertain the influence of the motion picture houses, and the discussion of the subject by the International Washington Humane Conference, has given the people of Washington a rare opportunity to acquaint themselves with every phase of the problem; its opportunities for good and evil; what constitute its principal needs of correction, and what methods should be pursued to insure this correction. It is an opportunity that should not be slighted, but which should be made the most of at the earliest possible time.

As far as I have been able to judge the principal evils connected with the operation of motion picture houses have all been touched upon in the various discussions of the subject. There is some difference of opinion as to the proper classification of these evils, but in my own mind there is no doubt as to which is the most serious and should be given first consideration.

It is the almost total lack of parental scrutiny of the children who attend motion picture shows. While this lack, in general, is one of the saddest features of modern society, it is particularly pronounced with respect to the cheap amusement resort.

Young children are allowed to wander at will on the streets after nightfall, without an escort or older companion, and, as a natural consequence, they are attracted by the brilliant lights and glitter surrounding these establishments. They gather on the pavements and meet those whom they never should know. The ruin of many can be traced to this cause alone and here the fault lies with the parents, and not with the children.

I am strongly in favor of the recommendation made at the Humane Conference that children be prohibited from attending motion picture shows unless escorted by their parents, or proper adults.

How this prohibition may be brought about I am not prepared to say. I should not be surprised to see it cared for eventually, as far as this city is concerned, by a stringent curfew law.

So strong is my belief in the evil consequences of the child being permitted to attend these shows unescorted that, unless there is a stop put to it through the influences of an enlightened public opinion, I am of the belief that nothing short of a curfew law may be able eventually to control it.

Next to the restriction of children, I am impressed that the most important feature to the motion picture houses that needs to be regulated is that of the films. Undoubtedly, there should be a rigid censorship of all films, for there can be no estimating the consequences on a child's mind of a based picture upon criminal or immoral suggestions.

When good, clean pictures are displayed, and the children who see them are properly chaperoned, the motion picture theatre has become largely an instrument for good. At least, its worst evils have been eliminated, and the others may be gradually disposed of by the employment of less radical means.

Too much stress cannot be laid upon the importance of proper ventilation and protection from fire, but these features are already under the control of the municipal governments, and it is to be presumed that they are being safeguarded as well as they may be under the law.

Regarding the operation of the motion picture houses on Sunday, I cannot say that I am opposed to this feature, provided they are not allowed to be kept open when church services are in progress.

The motion picture theatre would not be permitted to run in opposition to church, but during the hours when there are ordinarily no religious services being held, I can see no objection to their being patronized as a place of rest and recreation.

I was most impressed with a suggestion made by a delegate to the Humane Conference. Masujiro Honda, of Tokyo, who decried motion pictures which are calculated to inflame the minds of youth with contempt and hatred for other nationalities. Mr. Honda referred to a picture such as one showing a Japanese spy stealing valuable government secrets. Such films can accomplish no good, and, as Mr. Honda pointed out, they may lead to disastrous results.

As to the method to be employed in censoring films, I would suggest the creation of local boards clothed with legal authority. They might be operated as humane societies are. The latter have accomplished wonderful results in the protection afforded dumb animals. Motion picture censorship societies may achieve vastly more important results, both to the nation and to the individual, in throwing a safeguard around this new influence, apparently permanent, which operates so effectively upon the youth of the land.

"OLD NORRIS' GAL"

A Melies Western Drama

A GREAT man once said he believed there was a future in the West for every young man. He advised young men who wished to make a success to journey to that developing part of the country.

Frank Gray, in Melies coming release "Old Norris' Gal," is just such a young man. As a lawyer he has failed completely in the East, so packs his duds and takes a train to Idaho to make a fresh start. His hopes are rather crushed at first because business does not respond as quickly as he had expected. During the dull moments he frequented the village saloon where most of the inhabitants of the town congregated. A most peculiar circumstance in this place unexpectedly gives him a case. Mary Norris has come into the saloon to serve notice on the proprietor to discontinue selling liquor to her father on the grounds that he is an habitual drunkard. The saloon-keeper laughs at herand defies any snip of a girl to give him orders what he shall or shall not do, and asked her who would prosecute such a case. Frank Gray jumps to his feet and proffers his service to this young lady, who is being bullied.

Meanwhile Mary Norris persuades her father to leave the place and go home with her. On the way, owing to his staggering, she falls down a bank and is badly hurt. For the first time in his life old Norris realizes what drink will lead a man to and what odd accidents it will cause. He rushes to his daughter's side and after ascertaining that her life is safe, pledges himself to never touch liquor again and sticks to his promise.

Meanwhile the friends of the saloon-keeper. "Bud" Sykes, decide to send a committee of one to Frank Gray and demand him to call the case off. The young lawyer absolutely refuses and then the gang plots a scheme to kidnap him. They suspend him by a rope over the precipice and try in this way to extort the promise from him to drop the case. Then they build a fire under the rope and our attorney would have been no more had it not been for an Indian squaw whom he had once befriended. This grateful soul carries the news of his persecution to Mary Norris, who arouses the sheriff and arrives upon the scene just in time to hold up the gang and save Frank's life.

SCENE FROM MELIES SUBJECT "OLD NORRIS' GAL."

In due time "Bud" Sykes is convicted and the lawyer's reputation is won. All through the first struggle he has entertained fond regards for old Norris' daughter, and now that he is successful, makes no bones about it, but he pops the question fairly and squarely before old Norris himself. Could one be more worthy of this girl than he, who had saved her father from the life of a drunkard and made her home happy? That she marries him amidst cheers and demonstration by the populous is answer enough to that question.

"Old Norris' Gal" is an example of excellent photography and able acting. It heaps credit upon the firm of Melies.

PROCTOR BUYS ANOTHER HOUSE.

The biggest theatrical deal to ever take place in Elizabeth, N. J., was transacted Nov. 26th, when F. F. Proctor purchased the Marcus Loew photoplay and vaudeville theatre on Broad street. The house was, perhaps, one of the best known photoplay theatres in New Jersey, and was a worthy rival to the Proctor-Keith houses in this section of the country.

With the purchase of the Loew theatre, Mr. Proctor now controls nearly all the first class picture and vaudeville houses in the state. With two houses in Elizabeth, two in Plainfield and one in Perth Amboy, it makes an excellent circuit for the Proctor performers to play before going on what is called "big time."

The manager of the house under the Proctor management will be Frederick Thomsen. Mr. Thomsen stated a few days ago that the house would be practically rebuilt during the coming summer.

What Mr. Proctor paid for the house was not stated, but as it was one of the best paying theatres in New Jersey, it is said that Mr. Loew made a good profit on the deal.

Moore & Jacobs, of Morgan City, La., have opened a motion picture show in this city and gave the first entertainment Nov. 12.

W. H. Marple, of Wichita, Kan., has purchased the Best Theatre, of Little Rock, Ark., formerly operated by H. A. Peckham.

Playing the Pictures

By Clyde Martin

SINCE I have been conducting my articles in The Index I have received many letters from musicians asking suggestions for appropriate music for certain releases that have been booked in their theatres for some future date. It is very gratifying indeed to know that the musicians in the better class of theatres are looking after the details of the picture music and bettering their own conditions, as well as the conditions of the theatres.

I will be glad to receive suggestions at any time from picture musicians, and at any time I can be of service and give advice on appropriate music for any certain release I will do so, either by letter or through the columns of The Index.

Last week I received an inquiry from a Western exhibitor asking for a list of the most important traps and effects to be used by the drummer and behind the screen. From the tone of the letter I was led to believe the exhibitor was located in a small town with a limited number of amusement seekers to draw from, but was willing to take a chance at educating more picture fans by improving his show as much as his income would allow. I believe there are many more of the smaller exhibitors that are willing to spend a little money on effects, and for their special benefit I publish the list I believe to be complete for the small town show.

On the drummer's rack I would advise, as the most essential effects,

Sand Blocks	Triangles
Castanets	Tambourine
Crash Cymbal	Telephone
Wood Block	Electric Door Bell.
Tom Tom

The balance of the effects should be handled from behind the screen, and you should make it a point to have a competent person in charge of the concealed effects, as the least mistake on the part of your effect man may ruin a scene or possibly a whole picture. The most important line of effects to be usesd behind the screen consists of

Baby Cry	Midway Musette
Rooster Crow	Dog Bark
Hen Cackle	Chimes
Mocking Bird Whistle	Gongs
Steamboat Whistle	Cow Bawl
Sleigh Bells	Revolver
Tugboat Whistle	Wind Machine
Locomotive Whistle	Auto Horn
Horse Hoof Imitation	Thunder Sheet.
Train Imitation

It is seldom that you will find use for some of these effects, but it is well to have them on hand. Take, for instance, such a picture as "The Legacy," that clever production by the Vitagraph Company; just think what a help your tug and steamboat whistles would be to the scene where the old couple is shown on the ferry, crossing over to the New York side. The reason I mention this picture in particular, the first matinee this picture was run in our theatre the effect man was on the job, but the only thing he had was one tug and one steamboat whistle, and the Hudson River was a very tame affair that afternoon. But after the matinee I searched the town over and scared up fifteen or twenty good whistles. That night every one around the theatre with a good pair of lungs was on the job, and when the ferry scene came on, well, we nearly made the Hudson backwater to Albany. And the best part of it was the scene got a big hand and the picture caused so much comment the management kept the picture on and featured it for four days, matinee and night. This is what convinces me that the audience wants effects.

By the way, did you use a phonograph on the effect list when you run the Edison release of October 11? There was another chance for an inexpensive effect to make the hit of the show. Give them something different whenever you get the chance, and you will soon have them talknig about your show, and when you get them talking you can get their loose change.

Another impressive effect that can be worked by the drummer is a roll on the crash cymbal. Don't run a good thing in the ground, but wait until you get such a picture as the Pathe release of Saturday, October 8, "An Indian's Gratitude," and in the scene where the Indian turns and falls over the 250-foot cliff you can make your audience stand up if you will give a roll on the crash cymbal. Don't work this on every little fall; wait for a novelty like this Pathe picture and then you will take the audience by surprise.

The use of a thunder sheet is very seldom called for, unless you use it in such a picture as the Vitagraph release of November 19, "Francesca Da Rimini." Through the last scenes of the picture, during the approaching storm, try and work the effect of distant thunder, and then, when the cripple raises his dagger to kill, work up the scene with loud thunder from behind the screen, a roll on the crash cymbal is the drummer's end of the work; then, when the bolt of lightning strikes the lovers dead, muffle the vibration of the cymbal and thunder sheet so that the second they fall to the floor the house is quiet, and let the piano music fade away with the light on the picture. By handling the climax in this way it will be in keeping with the conception the producer has portrayed.

A musician should never stop playing through the showing of a picture. This is a great mistake that you will frequently find in the big houses as well as the small ones. This is one reason why I say there is no orchestra that can play the picture properly, for the simple reason the music of an orchestra is limited, and they are obliged to stop at times in the middle of a picture and wait their chance to go ahead.

This point was illustrated to me while on a short trip to Chicago. I happened to stroll into one of the largest picture houses in that city and, I believe, there was a Biograph on the screen. When I entered I was surprised not to hear music. By the time I was seated I had come to the conclusion the orchestra was either eating their lunch in the pit or had sent a representative to the box office with a request for more money. I had still another surprise coming, for, at the finish of the picture every one in the orchestra sat up, took notice, and, as the last ten feet of the film passed through machine they struck a chord and went into the introduction of the illustrated song. I went from there to a five-cent picture house just around the corner and found the same picture on the program that I had just seen at the larger house. The music at the five-cent house consisted of piano and drums, and when this same picture was thrown on the screen you would have been surprised to hear what that piano player made out of the picture. It is the same old story every place you go—an orchestra either plays long andantes and waltzes, or they sit and watch the picture.

Another thing that should be remembered by the musicians: Don't cut your chaser short. If it is the last show for the evening play until nearly every one is out of the house. By doing this you send them away in good spirits. If you are running illustrated songs or a spotlight song in connection with the pictures, and you have a song that has made a hit with the crowd it is a very good idea to play the chorus over for a chaser. I figure if I can play a chaser that will have the audience humming as they leave the theatre I have won a good point. In my next article I will show how it is possible to advertise a picture in such a way as to help the musicians in their work.

MAJESTIC THEATRE, PUEBLO, COLO.— G. M. MORRIS, MANAGER.

NEW THEATRE FOR SALT LAKE CITY.

That Salt Lake will have another playhouse of considerable pretense was the report emanating from local theatrical and real estate circles. It is reported that F. T. Bailey of Butte, Montana, is negotiating the purchase of a site on the west side of Main street, between First South and Second South streets, and will spend $50,000 on the enterprise.

The exact location of the building is being withheld pending final consummation of the deal. Mr. Bailey has been in Salt Lake for several days on business connected with the enterprise and is said to have his plans well developed.

The building will consist of a first-class theatre downstairs and a motion picture film exchange on the upper floors.

HAPPY HOUR PHOTOPLAY THEATRE SOLD.

L. C. Kitchen and Fred Smith, two well-known young men, of Sayre, Pa., have purchased from Fred J. Telaner the Happy Hour photoplay theatre at Athens. While the building has just been completed, before the managers open it is their intention to make some improvements to the interior.

It is also the intention of Messrs. Kitchen and Smith of adding vaudeville, providing the patrons will pay the price of admission for good acts. Good music and the latest songs will add to the program.

"LITTLE SNOWDROP"

Beautifully Colored Pathe Picture For Early Release

IT is some time since we have been treated to a picture as beautiful as the forthcoming Pathe colored subject entitled "Little Snowdrop." The subject is an adaptation of "The Magic Mirror" from Grimm's Fairy Tales, richly staged and artistically presented by the Pathe company of players. The coloring is done in the well known Pathe style, than which there is no better.

The original story is of a Queen who considered herself the most beautiful woman in the world. She knows this because her magic mirror told her so, and she was jealous of any other woman who was thought good looking. The picture begins with a scene in the Queen's boudoir where the Queen is being arrayed for attendance at court. She is greatly pleased with what the magic mirror tells her and goes to join the King.

The court scene is especially beautiful and animated. The King enters with his courtiers and takes his place on the throne. The Queen is announced and when she enters is immediately surrounded by the courtiers who flatter her with their pleasantries. While this is going on little Snowdrop enters. She is a very beautiful girl, and when the courtiers see her they flock about her, forgetting all about the Queen, who becomes so angry that she leaves the court at once.

When the Queen returns to her boudoir she grabs her magic mirror and there reads the legend, which tells her that Little Snowdrop is more beautiful than she. This determines her to have Little Snowdrop put out of the way; so she sends for a villain and tells him he must kill Little Snowdrop. As he is a very wicked villain he agrees to do as the Queen desires and departs on his errand.

Next day, while Little Snowdrop is walking about the grounds of the King's castle, she comes upon the villain who is lying in wait for her. He tells her that he has been ordered to kill her, but that she is so beautiful he cannot do it; but if she will give him her handkerchief and then run away and hide somewhere he will deceive the Queen and spare her life. This she agrees to do. The villain then kills a pigeon and stains the handkerchief with its blood and takes it to the Queen, who believes that Little Snowdrop is dead and is once more happy.

Little Snowdrop wanders through the forest until she comes to the home of the Seven Dwarfs. When the dwarfs discover her they are so enchanted with her beauty that they make a place for her in their house.

Next time the Queen looks in her magic mirror she learns that Little Snowdrop is still alive and at the home of the Seven Dwarfs. This makes her very angry and she decides to put her rival out of the way herself. She disguises herself as an old woman peddler and finds Little Snowdrop at the house of the Seven Dwarfs, where she attempts to strangle her. But the dwarfs come in time to save Little Snowdrop's life, so when the Queen looks in her magic mirror again she finds that her rival still lives. Again she tries to kill Little Snowdrop by giving her poisoned apples. Little Snowdrop eats the apples and apparently dies, for the dwarfs are unable to save her life. Believing her dead the dwarfs put her in a glass coffin and place her in a tomb in the rocks.

Just then the dwarfs hear the note of a winding horn and they disappear in a flash as the beautiful Prince and his band of retainers come on the scene. Discovering the coffin of Little Snowdrop in the tomb the retainers of the Prince bring it out and open it, whereupon the Prince succeeds in bringing her back to life.

The party sets out for the castle of the King and arrive at court, the Prince leading Little Snowdrop. The Queen is there and when she sets eyes on Little Snowdrop she is so frightened that she drops dead. The Prince is in love with Little Snowdrop and the King consents to their marriage, after which they live happily for the rest of their lives of course.

The beautiful coloring, so wonderfully near to nature, is an important feature of this picture. So carefuly has the coloring been worked out that the Queen's court gown shows all the effects of changeable silk. There is a massiveness to the mediaeval architecture of the interior views that give them a resemblance to the actual as we fancy it was in those times. Altogether there is little to be wished for of the qualities that go to make up a perfect motion picture.

The Palace motion picture theatre at 122 Main street, Paterson, N. J., threw its doors open to the public November 15, and the many patrons of the popular show house were on hand to congratulate the manager on the various improvements made at the show house since its closing several weeks ago. The place is now one of the safest in town and in addition to its large front exits has a rear exit ten feet wide. Non-inflammable films will be used at the theatre exclusively, and the operating room is constructed thoroughly fireproof. An hour's entertainment for five cents will be given by the manager of this house.

ANOTHER BROTHER FOUND THROUGH FILMS.

Rudolph J. Maller, a court interpreter, who speaks fourteen languages and has a good story for each, recently told one in English to the ship news men. About a year ago Mr. Maller, who was born in Turkey, was at a motion picture show in Fourteenth street, New York. He was startled to see the image of his brother Maximilian, whom he had not seen or heard from in nine years, walk into the picture of an aviation meet at Budapest. He was about to get up and shout the Turkish equivalent for "Say, Max, hold on!" when his brother moved out of the picture. Mr. Maller got the address of the exchange from which the motion picture showman got the film and finally had a chance to see it again. The film was made by a Paris concern. Mr. Maller went to Paris recently. He traced his brother to Vienna and found him in the motion picture business.

ADVERTISE BY MOTION PICTURES.

In order to have a novel show window, Gleason Bishop, the window dresser at the E. T. Barnes store, Salem, Mass., installed a picture performance in one of the large front windows, which faces the main street. The sight of the pictures in motion attracted much attention and drew large crowds to the store.

This is the first time that motion pictures have been used as an advertisement in a store window, and it now bids fair that many large firms will adopt the same advertising methods.

PROJECTION DEPARTMENT

Problems of the Photoplay Operator Discussed and Questions Answered

Edited by Will C. Smith

SETTING CARBONS AND GHOST.

Middletown, N. Y., writes that the sprocket holes on the film show at times and wants to know how to remedy this. Has a new machine. Also wants to know why blue spot shows in center of picture.

Answer—Regarding the sprocket holes showing at times would say that it is not always the fault of the projecting machine. It is sometimes the fault of the printing machine that printed the positive film, but this is a very rare thing now, as the cameras taking the negative and the printing machines that print the positive are all that can be desired. So, in this case, it is more than likely that the trouble is with your projecting machine. You might see if your top and intermittent sprockets and idlers and the guide rollers on your gate are all in line with the aperture, that is, see that none of them set to one side in relation to the aperture. Also see that your tension springs bear squarely on the aperture tracks, as one of the springs might set to one side and occasionally cause the film to move a little to one side as it passes the aperture, and in this way it would have a tendency to show the sprocket holes at times. If so, you should line up your sprockets and idlers. If your tension springs do not bear squarely on aperture tracks have them so they do. As to spots in your picture it might be due to your lower carbon not being set properly with the upper carbon, or you might have the wrong focal length condenser. Try moving your lamp-house backward and forward and if this does not remedy it try moving your lamp (arc) back—that is, to make a smaller spot on the aperture. It is more than likely that your lower carbon is a little in advance of the upper carbon and this would cause your carbons to burn so that you would have a blue spot in your picture.

BAD TENSION.

Pottstown, Pa., writes that he is using a Model "B" Edison Machine and finds that he has trouble with the films jumping off the lower take-up sprocket and would like to know how to prevent film from jumping off.

Answer—In all probability you have too tight a tension on your take-up. To remedy this you will find a set collar that holds the sprocket on the take-up shaft with a small screw in it. Loosen this screw in the collar and then move the set collar out a little and then tighten the small screw again. If this does not help it, probably your take-up belt is too tight. If so, take belt off and disconnect it and stretch it a little and then put it back on again; or it might be that your tension spring on the take-up bracket is too weak so that, when a patch comes through, it throws the film off the take-up sprocket. If so, would advise a heavier spring in take-up bracket; but I am sure you will find that the trouble is too tight a tension in your take-up feed.

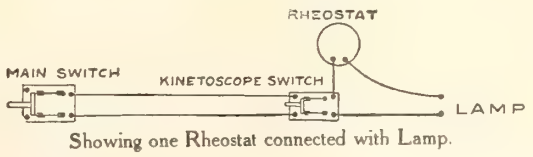
BAD LENS.

Louisville, Ky., writes he has trouble keeping his picture in focus. It will be in perfect focus and the picture will be good and clear and distinct; yet, without touching the lens the picture will become blurred and out of focus. I think the trouble lies in the lens. If you are using a tube and jacket lens I think the springs (or clips) that hold the tube lens in the jacket are so weak that the constant vibration while the machine is in motion makes the lens move and that would blur your picture, or put it out of focus. What you should do is to fix the springs (or clips) so that the tube holding the lens will be solid in the jacket. If you are using a lens with a rack and pinion adjustment, it is possible that the rack is a little worn so that the lens moves while the machine is in operation. Or, it might be that your aperture plate tracks or your tension springs are worn. Look them over carefully and if worn, put a new aperture plate in and a new pair of tension springs. See that your tension springs bear squarely on the tracks of the aperture. Sometimes the tension springs have a tendency to wear the tracks of the aperture plate at the aperture, causing the film, when passing the aperture, to buckle up a little. In that case the film would be out of focus but, since you say your pictures keep out of focus and stay that way, I am of the opinion that the trouble lies in your lens. Would like to hear further from you.

HOW TO CONNECT MACHINES.

Cumberland, Md., writes for instruction as to how to connect up motion picture machine using 110 volts.

Answer—As to the connecting up of a motion picture machine on 110 volts—if you are using a rheostat for resistance—put a 50 ampere switch, with a cut-out attached, on the wall of operating booth and run your main lines to one end of the switch, then run one line direct from one terminal on main switch to one of the terminals on your operating switch (on your table-board), then run one line from your operating witch (on your table-board) to one of the posts on the lamp. Then run from the other post on lamp to rheostat. Then run the other line from binding-post on your rheostat to the other binding-post on the operating switch (on your table-board). To make it more clear to you I submit the following sketch:—



Showing one Rheostat connected with Lamp.

This is all there is to it. If, however, you are working on direct current, then you must light your lamp and let it burn a few moments. Pull the operating switch on your table-board and if the top carbon holds the heat longer than the other one, then your carbons are burning correctly. If, on the other hand, the lower carbon holds the heat longer, then your carbons are burning upside down and it is then necessary that you change the wires putting the one you now have on the lower binding-post on to the upper, and the one you have on the upper to the lower. This applies to all machines. If working on alternating current, be sure that your carbons are centered—that is, have them perpendicular, so that the current in passing through the carbons will travel more evenly. If, however, you are working on direct current, the lower carbon (negative), should extend a little forward from the top carbon (positive), so that the crater formed in top carbon will give you the proper light. This applies to all makes of lamps. The only lamp that is somewhat different from the others is the Edison lamp. When working on this lamp, if working on alternating current you put lamp adjustment into the hole marked "A." If working on direct current, then change it to hole marked "D." These letters you will find on side of the Edison lamp (arc). If you use an Inductor, Economizer, or any other current saving device, run your wire from operating switch (under table-board) to current saving device, one wire to each post marked "line." Then connect wires marked "lamp" with lamp, using about a No. 6 flexible covered wire.

W. J. MORGAN RETURNS FROM EUROPE

Representative for J. D. Williams, of Sydney, Tells of His Trip to London and Paris—Mrs. Morgan Likes French Capital.

W. J. Morgan, of Seattle, Wash., who has been in London and Paris for the past month looking after business interests for J. D. Williams, the well-known Australian photoplay manager, of Sydney, returned from the other side last Saturday. Mr. Morgan, who was accompanied by his wife, found business in a most flourishing condition, both in the British and French capitals.

On his visit to the offices of The Film Index last Monday, Mr. Morgan stated he thoroughly enjoyed his trip and that he picked up many interesting facts of how business was conducted in London. "The photoplay theatres of London," said Mr. Morgan, "are the finest in the world; they are more like the regular high-class houses than anything else. In a London picture theatre one pays a higher admission (in proportion to the wage scale of the two countries) than you do in some of the best class vaudeville theatres in the United States. Then, again, the houses are more artistically built in every way. The pictures are in many ways better, although one sees many American pictures thrown on the screen.

"One thing that surprised me was to see many of the finest class houses located in such business centres as Oxford and Fleet streets, and during the lunch hours to see so many business men coming from them. This goes to show that the Britisher likes to mingle business with pleasure."

As a city, Mr. Morgan was more impressed with Paris than London, but there was not the same class of picture houses to be found there. Mrs. Morgan quite agreed with her husband that Paris had London beaten a mile in the way of boulevards, public buildings, modern hotels, and she did not let him forget the latest styles—especially the gowns for the coming season.

On the continent Mr. Morgan found the photoplay business brisk and many novel pictures were to be seen; there were also a number of American films that seemed to make a big hit. A Paris audience also likes good music, and this was one of the features of the photoplay entertainments that struck Mr. Morgan that would be well for American managers to follow.

During Mr. and Mrs. Morgan's stay in New York they were kept very busy. They visited many of the first-class photoplay theatres to see if the New Yorkers had anything on the Westerners, but they claim to find things vice-versa.

Mr. and Mrs. Morgan left for Seattle last Wednesday, where they will stay until the first of the new year; then they sail for Sydney to make their home there. Mr. Morgan will become one of the head men in Mr. Williams' employ.

By James S McQuade

REFERENCE was made in my last letter to the proposed exhibition of educational motion pictures in eight school "centers," in this city, by the board of education, the movement being supported and strongly endorsed by Dr. Evans, president of the board of health. The plan as outlined was to give picture exhibitions, at least three nights a week at each of these centers, other forms of entertainment and instructive features to be given as well.

I find that the initial step in introducing the motion picture as an educational factor in our public schools was taken by John D. Shoop, assistant superintendent of schools, and that Mrs. Ella Young, superintendent of schools, has also given the matter her sanction and support. The final decision, of course, lies with the Chicago board of education, and recent developments incline me to believe that that body will decide to give the proposed innovation a trial during the present winter.

An invitation by letter was given to all licensed manufacturers, or their representatives, to attend a meeting in the office of the health department, Franklin and Washington streets, Friday, November 25, at 3 o'clock p. m., to consult with Mr. Shoop and Dr. Evans on the practicability of the proposed plan. Most of the manufacturers were represented at the meeting, and Mr. George Kleine was selected to voice their views and to give such information as was required.

Approximate figures as to the cost of installing the necessary equipment for the projection of pictures in each school "center" were quoted, and the question of films was also taken up. During the deliberations, it was shown to Mr. Shoop and Dr. Evans that the manufacturers are obliged, for commercial reasons and from sound business policy, to view the movement as one of national scope and not one of locality. It was pointed out that to furnish the film subjects required for Chicago, or any other important city alone, would require a large investment of money, with an altogether inadequate demand, which would mean great loss to the manufacturers; whereas, if the movement were of a national character, sufficient prints of educational subjects would be purchased to recoup the manufacturers for their investments.

The attention of Mr. Shoop and Dr. Evans was drawn to the widespread interest taken in the educational picture by institutions of learning in this country, and to the ever-increasing volume of mail received by manufacturers from men and women in the educational field. It was the unanimous voice of the manufacturers or their representatives present that the Chicago movement and the national movement now being made had their hearty support and co-operation; and that everything possible—in a practical business way—that could be done to foster and encourage the movement, local and national, would gladly be done by them.

Dr. Evans then expressed the hope that sufficient educational films, on which the time had expired for their use by exchanges, could be found to enable Chicago to give the plan a trial this winter, and he was informed that, in all likelihood, such a demand could be met.

Assistant Superintendent Shoop then explained that it was the intention to purchase the films outright, and that it was more than likely—indeed almost a certainty—that each school "center" would be obliged to buy its films and pay for its equipment out of the funds derived from school entertainments and by the benefactions of friends, as the board of education, he thought, would not allow an appropriation for the purpose. The sanction of the board, as a body, is necessary, however, before any definite steps are taken, but it is the opinion of Mr. Shoop that permission will be granted.

It was shown during the meeting that as manufacturers do not sell or rent films direct to an exhibitor, a department for the handling of educational films for the use of school "centers" in the city could be formed in one of the three exchanges owned by the General Film Co. in Chicago, also that such department exchanges for educational films used in public schools or in other institutions of learning could be established in carefully selected cities throughout the country when the movement had become national.

Assistant Superintendent Shoop is an ardent lover of the motion picture and strongly advocates its use in the education of boys and girls, as well as of adults. "I am as deeply interested as I am in social settlement work," says Mr. Shoop. "Its influence and importance in the educational work of the future, it appears to me, are boundless."

Mr. Shoop will appear before the board of education in a few days, and the result will be duly announced in these columns.

The foregoing cannot fail to impress even the casual thinker with the conviction that the motion picture is proceeding forward with the steady, almost imperceptible, flow of a great glacial system. Apparently unsurmountable obstacles, for the time being, may appear to impede its progress; but just as the imponderable sea of ice grinds down or overcomes all resistance to its course, so the motion picture is shaping or removing all opposition that would turn it aside from the purpose of its discovery and development.

To many, perhaps, it has been heretofore something of the nature of a make-penny device that would enable them to grind out a competence until something better offered; but to the far-seeing men who have spent the best years of their lives and who have cast in their all for its development and advancement, the motion picture has appeared as a mighty force that is destined to lift the human race to higher planes of thought and living.

The introduction of educational pictures in institutions of learning cannot fail to give the picture industry generally an impetus that cannot be properly estimated at this time. Without doubt millions of good people, who have hitherto been inclined to look askance at the picture theatre, will be won over to picture entertainment in its broadest sense; and as these people will demand better structures for that entertainment, there will spring up within the next few years a worthy type of the picture theatre in America.

Let us all try and hasten that time by doing our level best to uphold the dignity of the motion picture.

ISIS THEATRE, DENVER, COLO.

FOYER OF ISIS THEATRE—MANAGER WEBBER, SITTING.

The Iris Theatre, Denver.

I had the pleasure of meeting that vivacious and charming young lady Mrs. Edna Karpeles, treasurer of the Iris theatre, Denver, during her brief stay in the city last week. Mrs. Karpeles is making a tour of the leading cities in the middle west and of the east at the suggestion of Dewitt C. Webber, owner and manager of the Iris, with the object of becoming familiar with all that is latest and best in the exhibition of pictures.

Mr. Webber is a showman of wide experience and since he entered the exhibiting field on the opening of the Iris last July, he has shown commendable enterprise in keeping thoroughly posted on everything new in his line and by selecting and adopting new departures in house management that appeal to his experienced judgment. Judge Webber, as he is popularly known in his home city, has made a great success with the Iris, Mrs. Karpeles informed me, it having very rarely occurred since the opening that its fine capacity of 1,700 seats has not been needed to accommodate patrons.

The Iris supplanted the old Curtis theatre, which was remodeled by Judge Webber at a cost of $25,000. In addition to the parquet and orchestra seats on the ground floor, which number 1,000, there are 700 more in the double balcony and gallery.

A COWBOY'S VINDICATION

Intense Dramatic Story and Excellent Acting Make this a Notable Essanay Western Photoplay

DISTINGUISHED by a poignant, heart-stirring and intensely dramatic story, excellent acting and carefully selected scenes, this latest Essanay Western offering, "A Cowboy's Vindication," will be found a notable and noteworthy effort. While the story is thoroughly serious and exploits a tragedy, the acting is of the subdued, earnest and sincere type, judiciously suppressing the morbid element, and generously supplied with heart throbs and legitimate thrilling situations.

The Essanay Western department, now operating in Los Gatos, California, is amply demonstrating the value of its strong organization. Where the company carried but from twelve to fifteen peope last year, there are now some twenty-eight thoroughly trained artistes, some of whom will be recognized as having formerly been connected with leading American theatrical companies. In "The Cowboy's Vindication" the cast is excellent, the interpretation strong, forceful, sincere. Particularly pleasing are the scenic settings, which show judicious selection with the artist's eye for beauty, and in harmony with the tone of the story.

The plot centers about four important characters, two brothers, one good, the other bad, Faro Nan, a dissolute Western dance hall woman, and Jesse Gibbs, a gambler and typical bad man with a slight taint of Mexican "greaser" blood. Mr. Franklin Hall, as the bad brother, and Mr. Anderson, as the good brother, work with genuine sympathy in their roles, while Faro Nan, by Miss Clara Williams, is distinguished by finely drawn character work. Mr. Brinsley Shaw in the part of Gibbs, is as finely polished and works with as thorough finesse as in other photoplays in which he distinguished himself, the first being the Essanay's detective drama, "The Thief." Altogether the cast is noteworthy and the results most gratifying.

The story of "A Cowboy's Vindication" points a moral, and in a keenly entertaining way. Two brothers, Frank and Will Morrison, are working their mother's extensive Western ranch. While Frank is a fine character, manly and upright, Will is weak, and his weakness has brought him down to a depraved drunkard and gambler.

The first scene shows Frank and Will leaving the breakfast table to attend to their day's work, but Will lingers, and, finally slipping out of the house, goes to the village saloon, where he is greeted by a crowd of roystering cowboys and invited to have a drink. In the saloon Faro Nan is waiting for a victim, and when Will enters draws his attention in flirting, which arouses the intense jealousy of Gibbs. The scene ends in a scuffle and a fight, when Frank enters and drags his brother home.

Here Will receives a sound lecture and yet, despite this, he plans to again visit the saloon. Slipping out his mother's purse, he counts the money, but she enters at this moment and tearfully pleads with him not to continue to break her heart. Will, however, is relentless, and brushing his mother aside leaves the house just as Frank enters, finds his mother in tears and sets out after his brother. They meet in the stable, a scuffle ensues, during which Will draws his revolver, and in Frank's attempt to wrest it from his brother's hands it is accidentally discharged. In the meantime, Gibbs in his intense jealousy has sought out Will with the intent to do away with his rival, and appears in the doorway of the stable just as the shot is fired. The men's backs are to him, and acting on sudden inspiration he raises his revolver and fires. Will drops lifeless to the floor, Gibbs disappears and the horror-stricken brother stares down at Will's body.

Knowing that he is not guilty, but also aware that unless he traces down his brother's slayer he will be accused, he hurriedly writes a note, leaves it on his brother's body and slips out of the stable.

In the meantime Gibbs has returned to the saloon and informed the sheriff, who is there, of having heard a shot in the Morrison stable and seen Frank running away. The sheriff and posse hurriedly ride to the scene, but return to the saloon just as Frank enters and is grapping with Gibbs, who is forced to confess it was he who committed the crime.

SCENES FROM THE ESSANAY WESTERN SUBJECT "A COWBOY'S VINDICATION.

NO LAW TO STOP BUILDING PHOTOPLAY HOUSES.

There has been much agitation on the part of many Buffalo citizens, as to whether photoplay theatres have a right to be run in the vicinity of churches. So great has been the feeling between the church people and photoplay managers that the advice of Corporation Counsel Hammond was asked. After looking up the law, Judge Hammond stated that there was nothing in the city charter which prescribes the location of such theatres. He also assured both parties, that there was nothing in the penal law nor the general laws of the state which says where a motion picture shall be located.

Answering another request for information regarding dancing on Sunday, Judge Hammond pointed out that halls rented for the use of public dancing on Sunday nights were unlawful, as the city ordinance provides that no dancing shall be permitted on the Sabbath day.

WOMEN DON'T WANT TO REMOVE HATS.

What will be the outcome between City Solicitor W. G. Jenkins and the female patrons of the photoplay theatres of Youngstown, O., regarding the removing of their hats, has not yet been determined. While the City Solicitor might lose his pull with the fair sex, it is claimed that the managers are losing the money, owing to the fact the ladies will not patronize theatres where they have to remove their hats.

It is said that ladies don't mind removing their hats at the night performance, but in the afternoon they run in the photoplay theatres for a few moments during shopping hours, and it is too much trouble to take their hats off.

As one arrest has already been caused by one woman refusing to remove her hat, many ladies are becoming "leary" as to the result, and by not patronizing the theatres in the afternoon they (the ladies) are under the impression they are getting even with the City solicitor.

POLICE FOR NORFOLK PICTURE SHOW.

The Board of Control, Norfolk, Va., will in the future detail a special policeman to look after the crowds in the photoplay theatres, and also cause the fire and police laws to be carried out. This will take much responsibility off their shoulders, as it required them to keep an extra man on duty all the time looking after the crowds.

For the Granby, Virginia and Columbia theatres, H. S. Reid has been detailed as the special officer.

MORE EXITS FOR COLUMBUS THEATRES.

At a meeting of the Columbus, O., city council judiciary committee, Nov. 18, a measure was approved providing that photoplay shows provide an exit for each 150 seats on the first floor and one for each 75 seats in galleries.

A measure to regulate the storage of volatile inflammable materials will be reconsidered as the present proposed measure is not held fair by some of those concerned.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyright by J. H. Hallberg. All Rights Reserved.

SYNOPSIS OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 14.—Electric service within a building must be amply protected by proper fuses and switches, and a suitable distribution panel should be located at a convenient point giving full control of all circuits within the building. Examinations should be made of all contacts, fuses and switches to insure minimum loss and to improve the operation of the lamps and apparatus connected to the system.

"ELECTRICAL TALK" NO. 14.
Three-wire Service Within a Building.

In "Electrical Talk" No. 14, the electrical service had our attention, and in the latter part we discussed in particular the two-wire service which was fully described and illustrated by the cuts.

I now ask you to give your attention to the following explanation and cuts relating to the three-wire service, which requires the usual protecting, metering and distributing devices—the same as for two-wire service, but in somewhat modified form, because of the fact that the three-wire system has a third or "neutral" wire between the two outside wires, and instead of delivering only one voltage it is possible to get two different voltages from a three-wire system, which is often of advantage, and besides, it makes it possible to carry a heavier load with smaller wires, switches, fuses, etc.

Three-line fuses.
Three-pole-line switch.
Meter.
Three-wire panel board.

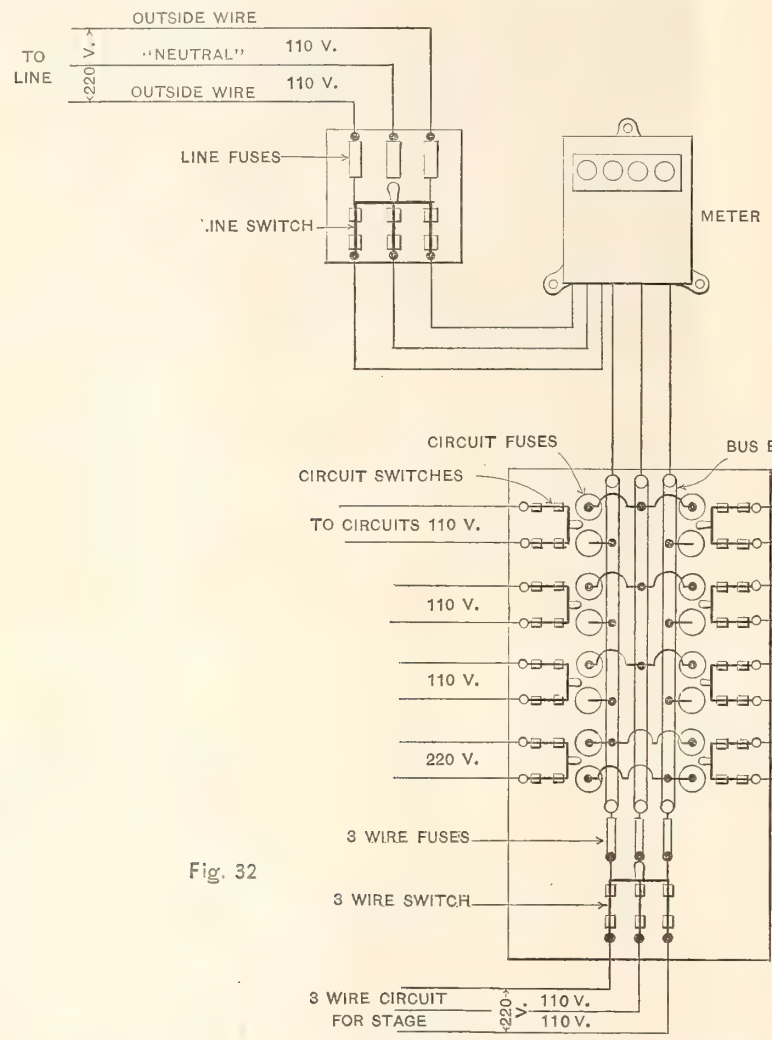

Fig. 32

The line fuses are connected to the three-wire lines coming into the building. On the outside wires, there is usually a pressure of 220 volts and between the "neutral" or center wire and either one of the outside wires the voltage would then be 110. The wires leave the switch and go into the meter. From the meter three wires are run to the distributing panel board, which is clearly illustrated in Figure 32. You will note, that the three top circuits on each side of the bus-bars deliver 110 volts, because they are connected to the middle and one of the outside bus-bars alternately. The two lower switches however, are connected to the outside bus-bars only, therefore the voltage available on the two lower circuits is 220 as may be desired for large ventilating motors, motion picture and stereopticon lamps or for spot lights operating on electric economizers. At the bottom of the panel board, I have illustrated an additional set of three-pole fuses and a three pole switch for a three-wire circuit as may be required for a separate section of a building, for instance in a theatre the panel board may be in the front of the house where the electric company's service enters and from this point all of the local circuits are controlled, but for the stage lighting a separate three-wire circuit may then be run to the stage to feed the panel board for the various stage circuits, auditorium lights, etc., which must necessarily be under the control of the stage electrician. This arrangement gives regular three-wire service for the stage practically independent of the other lighting circuits and gives also either 110 or 220-volt current for the stage as may be required for various types of appliances and lamps used for stage work.

Figure 33 illustrates a more simple form of three-wire distributing board made up of standard two-wire or three-wire cut-outs with switches and fuses mounted on the regular porcelain base. These may be mounted in a suitable cabinet lined with slate or sheet iron as already described in "Electrical Talk" No. 14, for the two-wire system giving perfect protection and control of the various circuits.

You will note that in Figure 33, for convenience sake, I have placed the three-wire branch circuit, switch and fuses at the top as may be required for a small stage circuit. Below is mounted three-wire to two-wire cut-outs delivering 110 volts to each circuit and at the bottom there is a two-wire double branch cut-out connected to the two outside wires only, therefore giving 220 volts to each circuit. You will understand that any number of cut-outs of any desired type can be added or arranged in any suitable manner for giving 110 or 220 for either two-wire or three-wire circuits.

Whenever three-wire service is used, i-t becomes just as important to the operator and the electrician within the building to balance the load on either side of the system as perfectly as possible just the same as the electric light company has to do it outside of the building, in fact, you should be even more particular about the balancing within the building because of the fact that your service is smaller and unbalanced condition within the building is more likely to give trouble than unbalancing outside of the building. The balancing of the interior lighting is of course difficult to accomplish, if a large unit like a motion picture arc lamp is connected to one side of the system to operate on 110 volts, therefore, it is always desirable to connect the M. P. lamp, stereo and spot lights to the outside 220-volt wires as illustrated in Figure 33 at the lowest cut-out. In that case it is of course understood that when 220 volts is used and a rheostat is employed for the control of such lamps, the load is twice as great as it would be with 110 volts, but the "balance" of the system is maintained perfectly and by the use of an electric economizer the loss can be entirely done away with thus maintaining the "balance" of the system.

SUMMARY.

The three-wire service within a building requires careful balancing of the load giving an equal number of amperes on either side of the three-wire system.

When M. P., Stereo, or spot lights, are operated on a three-wire system it is better to connect such lamps on the outside or 220-volt wires.

In our next talk we will discuss the Recording Watt Meter.

BIG PHOTOPLAY HOUSE FOR CLEVELAND

Atlas Amusement Co. Will Erect Largest of Its Kind in Cleveland—House Will Seat 1,500

What is claimed will be the largest photoplay theatre in Cleveland is to be built on a vacant lot on the north side of Euclid avenue just east of East 83d street and almost directly opposite the Knickerbocker apartments. It is to seat 1,200 or 1,500 people and will be fireproof throughout.

On Friday Nov. 18 the lot, with a frontage of 100 feet and a depth of 294 feet was leased by Mrs. N. E. Backus to the Atlas Amusement Co. for a period of ninety-nine years. The Atlas company consists of Emanuel Mandelbaum, president; William A. Sherman, treasurer; Max Schachtel and H. J. Mandelbaum, directors.

The new building is to be erected in the heart of one of the most exclusive sections of Euclid avenue. It will probably have a white tile front and be equipped with balconies on the inside. It has not been decided what the exact dimensions will be, but it is likely that it will cover almost the entire lot.

Architects have been engaged to draw plans for the new building. Work will not be started until early next spring.

Two other photoplay theatres are being erected by Baird & Saurbrey. One is for the Madison Avenue Amusement Co. on West Madison avenue near West 96th street. It will seat 300 people. The building, which is being remodeled for theatre purposes, was formerly a church. The other showhouse is for the Glenside Amusement Co. and is on Woodland avenue near Buckeye road. Extensive alterations are being made to a building which had been in use for some time for the same purpose.

FAMILY THEATRE, HAGERSTOWN, MD., SOLD.

Auctioneer C. A. C. Ohler, of Hagerstown, Md., sold on Nov. 12 for Sheriff Barber, the Family theatre effects to Thomas Spielman, George B. McC. Wolf and E. R. Crowe for $525. The theatre contained a motion picture machine and other apparatus connected with a motion picture show. The effects were sold under distraint proceedings. The rent owing the Masonic Temple Association was about $200.

It is understood that the gentlemen contemplate conducting a high class motion picture and vaudeville show, with Mr. Spielman as manager. Mr. Spielman is experienced in this line of business, and will no doubt make a success of the venture.

"IN NEIGHBORING KINGDOMS"

A Medieval "Life Portrayal"

PARENTS have no business to do the courting for their children. Let the boys and girls do their own courting and everything will come out right as it did with Princess Norma and Prince Philamon whose fathers tried to bring about the marriage of the young people before they had seen each other.

King Priam, father of the Prince, insists upon his son wedding the daughter of King Kenwill, of a neighboring Kingdom, who is just as determined that his daughter shall marry the Prince. Both the young people refuse to meet each other and the case seems to be hopeless.

The Kings at the same time happen upon the same scheme to bring about an introduction. Each have an artist paint a picture of the Prince and Princess, who make them appear as ugly as possible and thus the plans of the two Kings fail; when the portraits are exchanged the youth and maiden consider the other quite undesirable and unattractive.

The old monarchs are not to be thwarted, but they are and they are not; they don't have their own way about it but the young folks do. The Kingly parents swear by all that is holy that their offsprings shall be united and the offsprings declare they will have their own way about it and they do.

The Princess Norma leaves her home and assumes the disguise of a goose girl, exchanging her royal robes with the peasant and taking her place as a geeseherdess assuring herself that she will at least have the independence of making her own choice even though she marry out of her father's station. Prince Philamon deserts his father's palace and changes places with a miller for the same reasons as Norma declaimed.

Love has ways and means of doing things that are surpassing strange and as love would have it, Norma and Philamon meet, fall in love and she expresses her regret that she is of noble birth and cannot marry Philamon. Kings Priam and Kenwill will not be denied by their children who have both returned to their homes. They arrange the nuptial day and reluctantly the two princely scions meet to learn that they were already in love with each other and Norma was the goose girl and Philamon, the miller.

The Kings are exceedingly happy and the wedding bells ring out a long and joyful peal of gladness.

This picture is of medieval tradition and ancient folk lore, has all the picturesquely costumed characteristics of some antique tapestry painting. The illustration which is used in this review of "In Neighboring Kingdoms" is a sample of what it is like. It seems almost impossible to direct and produce pictures in which such flights of artistic imagination and originality are carried into effect when we see live geese driven by the Court Fool directly and under complete control in carrying out this ornate and superb Vitagraph Portrayal.

PICTURES FOR SOUTH AMERICAN BUSINESS.

United States Consul Thomas W. Voetter, of Saltillo, Mexico, in a report to the Bureau of Manufactures of the Department of Commerce and Labor, Washington, D. C., suggests that American business men who are planning to make a tour of Latin-American countries, provide themselves with motion picture films, showing the leading features of the districts they represent in this country.

"These views will provide an instructive and novel method of entertaining the merchants of the Latin-American cities visited," says the consul. "The views could be accompanied by a running comment in the Spanish language.

"Another idea which may commend itself to business tourists who visit Mexico is that of equipping a baggage car with those products which seem to have prospect of sale there. This car will be an exhibition in miniature."

WILL BANQUET EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE.

The Exhibitors' League of Motion Picture Showmen will meet in Columbus, Ohio, on December 5, and most of the local exhibitors and members of the league will be in attendance. There will be a banquet at the Southern Hotel.

"A TIN-TYPE ROMANCE."—Phil, with his dog Jean, is spending his vacation at the seashore. They are seen walking on the sands; Phil's hat is blown into the water and Jean fetches it safely back to his master. Tired with his long walk, Phil lies down on the beach and falls asleep.

Jean steals away, and while trotting along the shore sees an old bathing hat in the water, gets it and carries it to Phil. Jean, encouraged by the petting he receives when he rescued his master's hat, has evidently got the habit. Phil pats his dog's head and continues his nap.

Resting at another point on the beach we see Beth, a pretty girl, who is dreaming sweet dreams in the Land of Nod. Jean is looking about for new adventures; seeing the young girl's hat lying beside her, Jean picks it up and takes it to the source of his previous commendations. To say that Phil is surprised at the presentation of the hat is putting it midly, and he determines to find its owner.

His dog soon leads him to Beth, who is previously awakened by the barking of the dog, but pretends to be asleep. Phil comes cautiously forward, and when he sees the girl he is smitten with her charms, but refrains from disturbing her; he silently leaves the hat and noiselessly gets away. This is a disappointment to Beth—she had hoped to become acquainted. To accomplish this she throws her hat into the water and screams. This brings Phil and Jean back; the hat is recovered and Beth is profuse in her thanks.

Acquainted, they now stroll along together and become friendly. In the course of their meandering they pass a photograph gallery and agree to have their tin-types taken, which they exchange.

Beth, at the hotel, is seen in her room cutting out Phil's face from the tin-type and placing it in her locket. Phil is also seen doing the same thing with Beth's tin-type, putting it in his watch charm.

They meet again. Sitting together on the beach with Jean at their feet, Phil proposes to Beth and she accepts him. He wants to know what is in her locket; she wants to know what is in his. She says she asked first, and they have a real lover's quarrel and part. Jean is taking it all in, but, of course, says nothing. Phil, in despair despondently strides the beach, takes his watch with fob and locket from his pocket and throws it on the sand, smites his breast and acts as if he contemplated suicide. Jean picks up the watch and fob and runs off in the direction Beth has taken.

Beth, in her loneliness and agitation, is gloomily looking at her locket, unloosens her hair, takes off her shoes and stockings; throws her locket aside and behaves as if she, too, were seized with the suicidal mania.

Jean now appears, places Phil's locket near Beth and takes her locket to Phil. The two lovers look into each other's locket and behold their own faces. It does not take very long for them to get together, make up and renew their betrothal with caresses and kisses and sweet converse as they sit underneath an umbrella on an isolated rock far out in the water, presenting a very novel situation.

"HE WHO LAUGHS LAST."—What is more pitiable than a lady-like man? He is, putting it midly, a laugh. And that is why the fellow members of the club to which Reggie belongs are all laughing over a joke one of the fellows is telling about him. "Here he comes now"—bashful and timid, but withal a very likeable young chap. He is invited to join them, and while talking to the president of the club, a fat, pompous gentleman, he accidently steps on his foot. "The fat grouch" goes for Reggie with a fiendish delight, and when the boy leaves the room to escape his abuse, all hands, including the president, join in a hearty laugh at the expense of their innocent butt.

A few evenings later, at a dance, Reggie is introduced to Miss Ethel Stevens by the president of the club, and she shows a decided preference for him, much to the displeasure of her escort and admirer, Ralph Morris. She eludes Ralph and seeks the company of Reggie, with whom she dances, leaving Ralph foolishly holding two plates of ice cream, which she placed in his hands and which she and Reggie had been eating. Reggie is completely smitten, and makes up his mind there is only one girl for him, and that one is Ethel.

The next night Ralph, having noticed Ethel's fondness for Reggie, loses no time in going to her home and popping the question. Ethel refuses him, notwithstanding her father's angry intercession for Ralph. In tears Ethel is bemoaning her fate when the maid announces Mr. Reginald Foster. "Let him come in," is the ready command from Ethel. It is Reggie's turn now. He proposes, is accepted with open arms just as Mr. Stevens enters the room. He orders the young man from the house, but his daughter remains firm in her proclamation of her choice.

Ralph goes to the club, piqued at his "turn-down," and especially sore at Reggie. One of the club members proposes a good joke on Reggie; he is very enthusiastic over it. An invitation is sent to Reggie to attend a reception at the club that evening. The invitation is despatched by a messenger, and the recipient comes to the club that evening in full dress, carrying a bouquet, only to find out it is all a joke and meet the jeers and laughs of the whole club.

Reggie acknowledges that it is "on him," and then declares that he will get "one of them" with interest, or know the reason why. Ralph Morris tells him that if he pulls a joke on him he will do anything he may ask of him, if it is in his power to grant it. "And I will agree to see that the agreement is carried out," says the club president. They draw up the terms, and after they are regularly signed and witnessed, Reggie bids them good night.

Reggie had had his eye-teeth cut, and he proves himself to be made of the right stuff. He acquaints Ethel with his agreement with Morris and with his plans of getting even.

Just a week later a swell reception is given, and everybody is there but Reggie. Ralph is there with Ethel and her father; the club president and all the members, too. While everything is in full swing a young woman bursts upon the scene, throws herself upon Ralph, claims him as her long-lost lover and begs him not to desert her for another.

The dancers stop, and everybody crowds around Ralph and the excited woman. Ethel's father denounces Ralph as a villain; the president of the club and all hands are astonished. Ethel, who knows all about it, is all smiles, and when the joke has gone far enough Reggie pulls off his wig. Ralph acknowledges himself beaten, and when Reggie asks Mr. Stevens for his daughter's hand Ralph has to withdraw in his favor, and when the father objects the club president soon wins him over and gains his consent to the acceptance of a son-in-law who is clever enough to successfully get the laugh on them all.

"THE COLOR SERGEANT'S HORSE."—The Color Sergeant's horse, "Don," is no ordinary animal; it possesses extraordinary intelligence and a great fondness for his master, and this picture proves it, although it embodies a love story about the Sergeant, his sweetheart and the English flag.

The Sergeant, before starting for the field, bids his sweetheart good-bye. She presents him with a flag and tells him if he bears it safely through and brings it back to her after the war she will marry him. "Don" seems to appreciate the agreement, and kisses the young lady good-bye. The Sergeant mounts his horse and they leave for active service.

In the encounter with the enemy the Color Sergeant is wounded and the flag is captured. When he is lying prostrate the horse takes his canteen and, going to a near-by pool, fills the bottle with water and revives his master, who tries to rise, but falls back exhausted, haunted with the consciousness of having lost the flag and his sweetheart.

"Don" follows the enemy, and while they are sleeping the faithful beast stealthfully enters the encampment, takes possession of the flag and gallops at top speed back to the wounded Color Bearer, and places the colors over his body. The Sergeant is delighted at the sight of his lost trophy, but cannot raise himself to his feet. He takes paper and pencil from his pocket and, writing a note, gives it to "Don" to carry to the English regiment.

The Arabs have discovered the flag has been recaptured and start in pursuit of the horse. They follow his footprints and are in hot pursuit when they encounter the English regiment, which has been notified by "Don" of the Color Sergeant's plight. They are defeated, and the Sergeant is saved and brought back, with his flag, to the city and the English headquarters, where we next see him attending a banquet with his sweetheart, now his wife.

"Don," who is outside the house, hears the cheering of the guests, walks to the window, looks in, nods a "How-do-you-do," drinks a glass of wine given him by his mistress, takes the Color Sergeant's flag from her hand and waves it triumphantly as his master and mistress lovingly place their arms around his neck and place their faces against his in acknowledgment of service rendered in making two loving hearts beat as one.

"A CHILD'S STRATAGEM."—Unreasonable jealousy is undoubtedly the worst affliction the human being is heir to. It not only makes the life of its victim miserable, but also affects the well-being of those of the social circle. That monster, jealousy, is most inventive and has an aptitude for reversing conditions consistent with the fevered perception of the poor unfortunate so afflicted. Mrs. Walton is one of those jealous-natured women who misconstrues every act of civility on the part of her husband towards any one of the female sex. In truth, she has no grounds for such feelings, as Mr. Walton is the most devoted of husbands and the kindest of fathers. Every trivial matter that can be construed circumstantial is the food for a quarrel. These quarrels are always in the presence of their little ten year old daughter. So frequent are these dissensions that the child, though young, begins to fear for the future. The worst comes, when one evening a party of lady friends call on Mrs. Walton; one of them deliberately tries to elicit Mr. Walton's attentions. He quite innocently and courteously acknowledges her, what he merely assumes, cordiality. However, Mrs. Walton's eye is ever on the designing lady, and foolishly imagines her husband attracted. After the visitors have departed there is the worst storm yet, and a separation seems inevitable. All this transpires with the child as a witness. Next morning Mrs. Walton packs her trunk and leaves a note to her husband on the breakfast table to the effect that she is determined to begin divorce proceedings. The little one now intervenes, but with poor success. Young as she is, she appreciates the enormity of the affair and is at a loss to prevent it. While she is sitting pondering at the table, an article in the newspaper concerning a Black Hand kidnapping strikes her gaze. The very thing! Supposing something could happen to her, everybody would become alarmed and excited and mamma and papa would no doubt forget their own differences in their efforts to lift the veil of mystery from her. Fine! She at once puts the scheme into effect by writing a letter to her mamma and another to her papa ostensibly from the Black Hand to the effect that she has been kidnapped. Dispatching the letter, she goes to hide at her aunt's home. Arriving at her aunt's house, she finds the place vacant, the aunt having moved. There is nothing for her to do but to stroll about and kill time. This she does, but wandering so far she loses her way, and falls into the company of some poor but honest folk. Telling them her address, Jimmy, the newsboy, volunteers to escort her home. Meanwhile, Mr. and Mrs, Walton are thrown into a state of wild excitement and in their endeavors to locate their missing child forget all else. Hither, thither the search is made, but in vain, and they are both on the verge of mental collapse when the little one, escorted by the gallant newsboy, enters. She then makes clear the reason for her escapade. The parents now realize how foolish they have been and what a lesson their little tot has taught them.

"TURNING THE TABLES."—Mr. Peck has long had a weakness for going out with the boys. Though a married man, he has not been able to fully control the craving for a little game of pinochle. His wife grows tired of these regular sessions and puts her foot down hard. "No more." Peck, however, must get out, so he resorts to that effective subterfuge, "A sick friend." It goes, and he is allowed until ten to return. At ten o'clock the game is just getting warm and a breakaway is impossible. Mrs. Peck has begun to doubt the truth of the "sick friend" story, and starts out after the renegade Peck, making tracks towards the nearest cafe. Entering, she loudly insists that the manager present her husband. Peck, who is in the back room, hears her voice, and diving out the back way, beats it for home, while the madam is searching for him. Getting into bed, after putting the clock on a couple of hours, he is apparently asleep when she returns. Aroused by her entrance, he, with mock dignity, demands, "Woman, where have you been until this unseemly hour?" Well, he really makes her feel the incriminating evidence of her own apparently compromising position, and not being able to give convincing proof of her innocence, she becomes abjectly contrite, promising never to deny Peck his little pastimes.

"HAPPY JACK, A HERO."—Everything on this earth can be made useful at times, and even that odious parasite the "hobo" may pull some stunt that will win for him high esteem and laudation. It is the evening of a reception given by Mr. and Mrs. Stamford in honor of their daughter's birthday. The house is beautifully decorated and one of the features is the antique room. In this room stands a figure in a suit of armor of value. During a skylarking between the butler and maid this figure is knocked over and broken. In terror the butler, fearful of the consequences, rushes out to get some one to stand in the suit instead. Happy Jack, the rover, passing by at the time, takes the job on the promise of a good feed. There have been a couple of sneak thieves operating in society circles, and they learning of the affair, plan to attend. In evening suits, they present themselves, and while the butler is engaged with one of them, the other pilfers two invitation cards, which gain them admittance. The daughter is presented by her father with a beautiful diamond and pearl necklace. During the evening the crooks nip it, and going to the antique room to examine their spoil, espy an open safe. This is easy, and they at once begin to help themselves. This is done under the eye of Jack, whom they think a stand of armor. When their work at the safe is about complete, Jack discloses himself, holds them up and hands them into custody. You may imagine his reward now amounts to something more than a feed.

"THE WINNING OF MISS LANGDON."—Jack Norworth had one desire, one ambition, and one hope in life—to win the heart and hand of Miss Langdon. He had been born and reared in luxury and wealth, but lacked some of those finer qualities which go towards the making of a girl's ideal, such as the fancy of Miss Langdon had pictured to herself. She liked Jack. He was good company, a perfect gentleman, full of pleasant surprises, but back of it all she did not feel that he possessed just the sort of stuff that ideal husbands are made of. So, when for the fourth time he proposed to her, rather than taking it seriously she came to the belief that it had become a habit with him rather than a desire. In fact, she would have been greatly surprised if he did not propose at least once in a fortnight.

Just after his fourth proposal the militia was ordered out on peace manoeuvres (to capture Boston in a sham military operation), and Jack, being a captain, of course had to go. Far from being displeased at the prospect, however, he rather liked it, as he always did look perfectly stunning in his captain's uniform, and besides it gave him a chance to be near Miss Langdon, although this latter was not strictly in accordance with military rules. Miss Langdon had decided that he was not to hang around her home, especially while her father and mother were away, so she took it as a huge joke when she succeeded in arranging with two common soldiers of the opposing forces to capture the captain. But here she had made a serious mistake, for in this case the common soldiers were none other than two desperate tramps who had stolen their uniforms and were filling their pockets and stomachs under the guise of military orders.

But young Jack Norworth was somewhat more of a soldier than she suspected, and he at once discovered the two imposters under their military exterior. Without revealing his discovery he succeeded in getting them to let him escape and shoot at him, thus rendering him technically "dead" according to military regulations. He was thus enabled to watch the movements of these two idlers, who were shortly afterwards surprised by Miss Langdon in the act of robbing her bedroom of all its silver and jewelry.

The whole affair, which started as a joke with her, would have ended in a tragedy if Jack Norworth had not arrived at the critical moment and put up such a desperate fight. This entirely changed Miss Langdon's opinion of him and she eventually placed all her future happiness in his keeping.

The picture is a delightful comedy drama and is carried out in a manner that is well worthy of its illustrious author, Richard Harding Davis, by the members of the Edison Company. The photography throughout is of the best.

"THE LIFE OF A SALMON."—Mr. and Mrs. Salmon are very interesting individuals among the inhabitants of the deep. Their life offers many strange facts and interesting features, and gives one considerable food for thought. That the maternal instinct is deeply rooted in their nature is plainly exemplified in the opening picture of this very interesting film by the Edison Company.

We are first shown the picturesque canyon of Capilano, near Vancouver, B. C. As the camera descends the rocky cliffs, showing their height and grandeur, we pause for a moment to give the spectator a passing glimpse of a roaring mountain stream, which is exceedingly swift and icy cold. A moment more and we are shown a waterfall between two huge, jagged rocks, the drop being about six and a half feet. A boiling mass of water is hurled with terrific force downward, and here we catch the first glimpse of Mr. Salmon and his wife and their life's struggle for the continuation of the species. We are shown the salmon frantically endeavoring to leap the falls. Time and time again they hurl their bodies into the air, only to be caught by the swift current of water and dashed against the rocks, but again they try, and so keep on trying until they either succeed in jumping the falls or are dashed to death—and all for what? That they may reach the place of their birth, lay their spawn and thus complete their life's work.

We are then shown the spawn in its various stages of evolution until it takes the form of a tiny salmon. These small fish remain in fresh water until a certain age, then drift down the mountain streams until they reach the salt sea, which is their habitation for three years. Then back they go to their birthplace and lay their spawn; and so the operation continues age after age, or would do so but for the inventive genius of man, who drops his nets at the mouth of these rivers and soon transfers Mr. and Mrs. Salmon to cans, ready for their place in the world's market.

This picture shows the operation if catching the silver horde, the setting of the trap, the drawing in of the net in the cold grey of the dawn with a catch of fifteen thousand salmon, and finally their delivery to the salmon cannery. We are also shown in this picture an Indian canoe race participated in by Indians who work in the cannery, eleven men in each crew and three crews, in their long, slim craft hewed out of solid trees. This is an exceedingly interesting sight and one that holds the attention and interest of the spectator from the start of the exciting race to the finish.

The entire picture was taken at Victoria and Vancouver, in British Columbia, and is one that is novel, interesting, instructive and pleasing in every detail.

"AMATEUR NIGHT."—The latest addition to the list of Edison short comedies deals with a popular form of entertainment and brings out all of the humorous possibilities in it. But with the comedy is interwoven a sort of love story, the outcome of which is dependent upon the result of the debut of a young

We all get a laugh in this comedy—a good long one at that. When you try to pull a joke on another fellow you want to count on your man. Reggie looks easy but he proves one too many for the boys when he comes back at them with a "Cracker-Jack" that keeps them guessing and brings them to a standstill, out-rivaling his rival for the heart and hand of the prettiest girl in town. It is then that he laughs and we all join in the "Merry Ha! Ha!" with him.

amateur actress to whom "amateur night" means so much.

We see at the start of the story a proposal and the rejection of the round faced youth because of the maiden's conviction that she must sacrifice all to what she thinks is her art. And then we see the practice of the art, the young lady's studying of the sleep-walking scene from "Macbeth," which she recites and declaims and "elocutes" comically. Convinced that she is a real tragedienne, she is highly incensed when she finds herself billed in front of the theatre as a comedienne and has the sign changed.

When the fatal night comes—"amateur night"—she stands in the wing and watches the acts of the other amateurs. There is a boy who thinks he is a Jew impersonator and who loses his nose at the critical moment of his monologue, and there is a wonderful (?) dancer of uncertain age whose poses and dances are absurd in the extreme, and on whom, as on the Jew impersonator, the "hook" is used with telling effect. There are two boy aspirants for honors who juggle Indian clubs with painful results, and who are likewise led away in disgrace. Then comes the human snake, and she sees him fall beneath a blow from a bag of leaves, dealt by a stage hand, after which he is led away by the manager of the "hook department." All this produces a disastrous effect upon the mind of the fair tragedienne, and she becomes more and more fearful as each one of the "artists" disappear. Her courage oozes out of her finger tips, and finally when the stage attaches are not looking she slips away and runs for the street, making her escape.

Her youthful lover has been sitting in a box awaiting her appearance and carrying a huge bouquet to toss to her. He becomes alarmed at her non-appearance, the audience becomes restless, and finally the youth climbs to the stage and demands to know where his lady love is. He is incontinently thrown out the stage door by the irate manager and, thinking that he is pursued, he in turn flies down the street, the girl flying down in the street in the opposite direction. They run around a corner into each other's arms, and the outcome of the story may be easily guessed.

"THE CAPTAIN'S BRIDE."—This film is an adaptation from John Luther Long's powerful story, "Baby Grand," and is one of the most thrilling and vital motion picture dramas conceivable.

The opening scene introduces us to the betrothal of a young couple in the far West, and we follow their fortunes in the next scene to a honeymoon on board ship. The day is bright and the passengers are enjoying a stroll upon the deck and the gentle motion of the ship. Then there is a sudden transition, for the next scene carries us to a storm at midnight, the ship upon the rocks, the waves dashing over it and washing the deck and the half-clad passengers clustered about the life boat. The sky is black and no land is visible through the darkness.

We are next apprised that the shipwreck is seen from the shore by catching a glimpse of the rocks and the life saving crew making efforts to reach the vessel in distress. Flashing back to the ship, we see the life boat lowered, the decks cleared and the ship apparently deserted. Then suddenly from the cabin appear our young lovers, who had evidently not been aroused in time to make the life boat. Next we see the powerful captain of the life saving crew on shore taking the rope in his teeth and starting his heroic swim through the breakers. On the ship the young lover is struck by a falling spar and hurled out of sight just before the captain climbs over the rail and finds the girl lying unconscious upon the deck. Taking her in his arms he begins his awful struggle with the waves and tide, and finally reaches the shore in safety with his burden.

Then follow scenes in the captain's hut. The girl is restored to consciousness, but not to memory. She has lost all hold upon her past life and is like a child. The rough crew on the out-of-the-way island take every care of the girl and she becomes apparently perfectly normal, but does not recover her sense of the past. Of course, each one of the crew falls desperately in love with her, and some comedy is provided in their attempt to dress her properly in the clothes which they bring her from the village store some miles away. Then they decide that it is not right that the girl should be there alone with men, and that someone should marry her and take care of her; and the choice is finally left to her. Unconscious of any past, the girl chooses the captain who has saved her life and whom she has learned to love in her present personality.

Meanwhile some scenes have shown the husband afloat on a spar and picked up by a ship, and thus it happens that when the little wedding procession starts from the station towards the church they are met on the way by a strange man who confronts them and halts their progress. The situation is intensely dramatic, for the girl, in spite of the fact that she stands face to face with her young husband, is still absolutely unconscious of the fact and wholly fails to recognize or remember him. He pleads with her and tries to recall the scenes of their courtship and marriage, but she turns from him to the stalwart captain whom she is about to marry, as if for protection.

Then the young husband remembers the little bit of lover's by-play which had been a part of their courtship, and it flashes across his mind that this suggestion may serve to remind her, even though his face has failed to do so. In imitation of a man drawing a pistol, he puts his hand to his hip pocket and points his finger at her. The gesture had been used between them so many times that as she sees the familiar movement it suddenly flashes into her mind that there is something that has been forgotten. At once the train of memory is started and it leads to complete recognition at last.

The subtle play of this picture is a triumph in the art of the silent drama. The picture is original both in the beautiful playing and the scenic environment, and should take a very high rank among the productions of the month, adding new friends to the millions who already welcome each Edison film, and also making them acquainted with John Luther Long and his splendid work.

ESSANAY CO.

"LOVE'S AWAKENING."—The opening scenes of the picture shows a number of young farm hands and their sweethearts seated on a load of hay entering the farm yard at the end of the day. Jewel Graham and David Allen are among the young people and when the others go romping from the scene David confesses his love for Jewel, but she impatiently turns away and welcomes Jim Long, for whom she shows a strong preference. Jim and Jewel turn away, leaving Dave in the deepest dejection.

Jim is the clerk in the small country drug store and the model young man of the village. Later when he proposes to Jewel the two seek her father, but the old man tells Jim he must go out into the world and make his fortune before he can have his bride.

The next day Jim, suitcase in hand, bids Jewel goodby and takes the train to the city. Dave is discouraged, but not without hope when he meets Jewel again and again pleads his suit. But Jewel refuses to listen, and her father consoles the young man, but offers him no encouragement, as Jewel, he knows, will have her own way in her love affairs.

In the city Jim is established in a fashionable drug store behind the soda counter. Here he meets a great many young ladies, and one of whom in particular is fascinated by Jim's good looks. Not long after, having met the city girl on several occasions, Jim finds that his love for Jewel is cooling, and in despair for fear of losing her he wires her to meet him at the station in Hopkinsville.

Shortly after Violet, the city girl, enters the store and coaxes a confession from Jim concerning the little country girl. Violet works her most subtle wiles and finally wins Jim over, persuading him to again wire Jewel that he cannot meet her.

In the meantime Jewel has received Jim's first message, and at 10 o'clock that night steals away from home and goes to the station, but Jim is not on the train, and as she turns to leave the station agent hands her Jim's second telegram. The girl is broken hearted when she reads it, and sobbing as though her heart would burst wanders aimlessly back toward home.

It is Dave who finds her and to whom she confesses Jim's faithlessness, and the big fellow's heart goes out to her as he helps her into his buggy and they drive home.

The next day Jewel has recovered from the shock and we find her and Dave seated on the Graham porch when a letter is handed her from Jim, who has been thrown over by the city girl and who now begs forgiveness and asks to be taken back.

Dave thinks it is all up with him and turns to go when Jewel puts her hand in his and tells him she has had a change of heart and that it is not Jim, but he who she loves. Her father comes upon them when they are in embrace and gives his blessing as the picture closes.

"A COWBOY'S VINDICATION."—Will and Frank Morrison, brothers, are working their mother's extensive ranch, and while Frank is manly and upright, Will is a dissipated gambler and drunkard. The first scene opens showing Frank, Will and their mother at breakfast. Frank rises hurriedly and goes out to the barn to saddle his horse, while Will lingers over his meal, then slips out of the house.

We find him next meeting with a little crowd of roystering cowboys, who drag him into the saloon and make him buy the drinks. Here Faro Nan, a dissolute habitue of the place, persuades Will to also buy her a drink. A little flirtation follows, which is interrupted by Jesse Gibbs, gambler and fancier of Nan, which ends in a fight, interrupted by the entrance of Frank, who drags Will from the place, makes him mount and rides home with him.

With a sound lecture for his dissolute ways Frank orders Will into the house and to stay there. Will enters, but finds his mother's purse, slips out a few dollars and is about to leave when his mother enters. She begs him to return the money, but fails to reach the hardened heart of her son, who brushes her rudely aside and stalks out of the room.

A few minutes later Frank enters and again finding his mother in tears demands an explanation. She tells him what Will has done and begs him to go find the boy and bring him home.

jealousy, slinks from the saloon with the intention of finding Will and putting an end to him, thus making a clear road to the heart of Nan.

Frank finds Will at the stables, about to saddle his horse, and after a short altercation the two are locked in a struggle, Frank endeavoring to wrench the gun from his brother's hand. In the struggle for the weapon it is accidentally discharged but neither are hurt. Just then Gibbs, who has heard the shot, appears in the doorway, takes in the situation and while the back of the two are turned shoots Will in the back and turns running from the scene.

Frank is horror stricken when the lifeless body of his brother slips through his arms to the floor. Yet he is confident that it was not he who fired the fatal shot. Gibbs is out of sight and Frank is alone with a smoking revolver, one of the barrels of which point convincingly to him as the murderer.

Realizing that he must act quickly he hastily writes a note and places it on his brother's body. It reads: "Circumstances look against me. I am not running away but am going to hunt down my brother's slayer."

Gibbs, in the meantime, has returned to the saloon, where the sheriff and several cowboys are together, and tells of hearing a shot in the Morrison stables and having seen Frank Morrison running away.

In a moment the sheriff is on the trail, finds the body of Will and the note left by Frank. Frank, however, is convinced that Gibbs is his brother's slayer and carefully steals up to the saloon and enters. Gibbs and he struggle, Frank finally forcing the desperate man to his knees just as the sheriff enters.

Proof sufficient is obtained when Frank seizes Gibbs' revolver and shows the empty cartridge barrel, while the cowed murderer breaks down and confesses himself guilty.

"ON THE MEXICAN BORDER."—It all started when the transcontinental railroad decided to run a branch line up through the wild country right to the Mexican border. Phil Scott had charge of the survey and he met and fell in love with Bessie Davis, whose father was a small rancher. Bessie and her sister, Nell, often came to the survey line to watch the young engineer, and they came under the notice of Pedro Ramairez, a Mexican whose reputation was decidedly evil. To Ramairez's admiration for Bessie was added a desire to be revenged upon Phil, who has resented the Mexican's insolence on more than one occasion. By abducting Bessie a double purpose would be served and Pedro sent his sister to tell Bessie that her sweetheart had been hurt and was calling for her. All unsuspecting, Bessie follows the girl and unhesitatingly enters the abandoned shack where Pedro is waiting for her. Bound, gagged and lashed to a beam Bessie is left alone to break her spirit while the plotters take themselves off. Meanwhile she had been missed and Nell finds Manuelita's gaudy scarf that the girl in her haste forgot.

This gives the clue, and she and her father, together with Phil, start out in search. Nell goes in search of the sheriff and the father to the round-up camp of Bar-B-Bar ranch, while Phil follows Bessie's tracks. He reaches the old cabin and his eye is attracted by a bit of white fluttering from a stovepipe hole. Bound as she was, Bess was able to push the short length of pipe from the hole, and tearing a ruffle from her skirt she waves it as a signal. In a moment Phil is inside the hut releasing his sweetheart, and a moment later the boys come up and capture Pedro as he is returning to his victim. There is promise of short shrift, but the sheriff and his posse ride up in time to rescue the Mexican and lead him away to stand trial for his offense, and the cowboys turn their attention to congratulating Bess and Phil.

"REGGIE'S ENGAGEMENT."—Reggie loved Celestina, and he did not love her any the less because she had a rich papa, though that was not the reason Reggie loved. Papa had not seen Reggie, and so Celestina wrote him to come out to Cliffwood Sunday and let father look him over. That was joyous news for Reggie, and he pressed his other trousers and packed them in a suitcase along with the engagement ring and other things and started for the suburban town. Celestina had to go to church with papa, but she left a note for Reggie to come straight to the house, and Reggie started out. It was a long walk, and when Reggie set himself down to rest he did not know that he was sitting on fresh paint until a constable arrested him because there was a murderer roaming about the country in a pair of white trousers with blood stains on them and Reggie's white ducks fitted the bill, except that red paint does not smell like blood. That is what let Reggie out, and he retired into the bushes to change to his other pair. All the trouble made Reggie thirsty and he headed for a saloon. Mike Regan was there, too, with a growler in a suitcase and a Sunday morning thirst. Reggie picked up the wrong suitcase and so did Mike. He found it out when he offered to treat a policeman to a drink. Reggie's white ducks with the red stains looked bad and the policeman told Mike to keep his explanations for the judge and dragged him to jail. Meanwhile Reggie had reached Celestina's home and to his great joy papa said Reggie wasn't much to look at, but he might do as a son-in-law. That was Reggie's cue to dig the ring out of the suitcase, and there was a mighty upheaval when the case was opened and the growler was disclosed. Reggie's papa-in-law-to-be was the reformer most active in making Cliffwood saloons close up on Sunday, and he had Reggie arrested for buying beer on Sunday. They took him to court, where Mike was being arraigned, and the tangle was partly straightened out. Then the real murderer was found, Mike and Reggie were freed and the ring was still in his own suitcase, and papa let him put it on Celestina's hand, and everyone was happy except the murderer, and he had no right to be.

"THE DEATH OF ADMIRAL COLIGNY."—The story deals with the plans of the wicked Queen-mother, Catherine de Medici, aimed at the political influence of Admiral Coligny, leader of the opposition party. She first arranges an attempt on the life of Coligny. The crime goes unavenged, and the Huguenots murmur at the death of their beloved leader. Catherine makes this the excuse for persuading her wretched son, Charles IX, to sign the order of their massacre. A wonderful scene shows the Queen-mother obtaining the reluctant consent of the unhappy Charles. After the dreadful day is done, and the streets of Paris are deluged in blood, the King is haunted by the ghosts of the men, women and children who have fallen victims to a woman's thirst for vengeance.

"A MAN OF HONOR."—A drama in which the hero, at great sacrifice and by endangering his life, saves the woman he loves from the tongue of scandal.

Every scene is in itself a perfect art study. The quality will be a revelation to most people.

"PROF. SCHLEMIEL'S HAT."—The tale of a mysterious hat which will cause wonder to every person who sees it. A trick film you will surely want to see. There is laughter and mystery in it.

"THE REVOLT."—Telling in realistic manner the exciting story of the days of Charles, the Dauphin, in France.

Eitenne Marcel (the Mayor of Paris), aided by a band of woodsmen known as "The Wolves," and by the peasants, sweeps the nobles out of power for a time, but through excessive violence loses all that he has gained for the people and is himself killed.

"WHAT GREAT BEAR LEARNED."—All is fair in love and war, but when we go into it we must take our chances.

A Mexican beauty, fascinating and venturous, is in love with a young Mexican, willing to do and act for him regardless of her own safety and reputation.

The Mexican is playing cards with a party of cowboys, and is aided by his inamorata in passing an extra card into his hand in order to cheat his opponents. The trick is detected by an onloker, who snatches the card and exposes the tricksters. The boys seize the Mexican, but through the cajoling entreaties of the woman, they decide to let them go, provided they will leave the territory and make themselves scarce.

Out in the wilds the two schemers have to shift as best they can. Going to the river for water the Mexican bravado comes across some Indians who are panning gold dirt in the stream. He goes back to his sweetheart and tells her, and she says she will get the secret of the source of the gold dust from Great Bear, with whom she has become acquainted and weedle the knowledge from him.

She makes advances to the Indian, pretends she is in love with him and he tells her where the pay dirt is located. Great Bear ignores his squaw and casts her aside when she discovers him embracing the Spanish deceiver. The wife tells the braves of the rascality of the woman and the treason of her husband.

The braves find that the Mexicans have robbed them of their treasures and that they are about to flee the country. The Indians seize the woman; she furiously resists them. While she is struggling her lover comes upon the scene and fights for her.

Great Bear learns the truth, throws off his mantle and challenges the Mexican. They draw their knives and "fight to the knife." The chief strikes his antagonist and he falls wounded upon the ground.

The Indians lift him to his feet and throw him on his horse, put the woman on her horse and tell them to go or they will suffer the consequences. They leave. Great Bear's wife stands before him; he hangs his head in shame and says he has learned a lesson. She promises to forgive and forget.

"RACHEL."—In "Rachel" the release of the Kalem Company for Wednesday, Dec. 7, Miss Alice Joyce, the new leading lady of the Kalem Northern Stock Co., appears in the strongest role to which she has yet been assigned. Rachel is the daughter of an old shepherd that lives on the estate of Prince Fredrovna, a Russian aristocrat. By chance Rachel meets the young son of the Prince, who has concealed his identity, and the two fall in love. Then Rachel's father has the misfortune to offend the Prince, and is horse-whipped and driven from the estate. Rachel goes with him, and the young Prince is in ignorance of her whereabouts. Later on Rachel's father joins the extremist section of the Nihilists. The death of Prince Fredrovna is decreed, and Rachel is chosen to carry out the plot, being still in ignorance that the Prince is her lover's father. Being well supplied with money she gains access into the Prince's household, and when a favorable opportunity occurs is about to shoot him when she is confronted by her lover. The young man, torn by conflicting emotions, allows her to leave the house unmolested, and she goes back to the Nihilists, there to acknowledge that she has failed. As she approaches the door she realizes the fate that is likely to await her when she tells her story. She makes up her mind to end her own life, and as the scene transfers into the room where the Nihilists are meeting a shot is heard and as the door opens the lifeless body of the girl falls in. On the door is written her final message, "I have failed."

"THE RESCUE OF MOLLY FINNEY."—This Kalem Indian release for Friday, Dec. 9, is a well authenticated story of early Puritan days and is one of the most dramatic and exciting in Colonial history.

Molly Finney was captured by some supposedly friendly Indians and taken to Quebec, and there sold at auction. She was bought by a French grandee as a servant and companion for his daughter. On the way from her native village on a long canoe trip Molly managed to drop into the water a message written on birch bark. This message was found by Captain McLellan, who in his sloop the Rose went to Quebec and succeeded in locating the Puritan girl where she was being held in slavery. His rescue of the girl forms the dramatic climax of the film and is an exceptionally strong and thrilling situation.

"The Rescue of Molly Finney" will undoubtedly rank as one of the very best things the Kalem Company has done in portraying real incidents of early days in the Colonies.

"THE WIDOW OF MILL CREEK FLAT."—To be married or not to be, that is the question—or is there more real happiness in connubial bliss than single blessedness? This remains for you to judge after seeing how Sandy, a miner in a western placer camp, allows the ship of state to founder on the rocks of domestic unrest.

The widow of Mill Creek Flats maintains a boarding house and among her stalwarts was Sandy Doolin, who has an eye on the charming widow and takes the first opportunity of popping the question, and much to his surprise she not only accepts, but takes no chance in his escaping, and almost kidnaps poor Sandy. He is led back to the house and she presents him to his fellow sufferers as her fiancee.

The widow has visions of a life of sunshine and roses and Sandy is to be her gardener. His first duty was to get in the wood and other exercises practiced around the home; the boarding house is to cease to exist and Sandy's pals are out in the cold for home, while he is relegated to the backyard to peel potatoes—he has the sympathy of all the boys. Casey has an idea and imparts it to Sandy as an avenue for his escape. The widow discovers the clandestine meeting and promptly returns the prodigal to the peaceful flats. Watching his chance he escaped from the widow. He has decided upon deception as the only means of regaining happiness and indites the following touching note to the public:

"Good bye all; married life ain't what I thot it was; I am going to try to cross the river and I can't swim a stroke. If my remainders are ever found don't plant me near Sally; she ain't at all peaceful. "SANDY."

It is delivered to Sally and she is almost on the verge of nervous prostration. The river is being dragged and the future looks gloomier; the boys are all invited back to board. In the meantime Sandy is in hiding. He ventures out and by chance his fair Sally meets him unexpectedly, and the chase is on—completing a picture of unique and interesting incidentals.

"IN THE WILDERNESS."—Simon Girty, an unsuccessful suitor for the hand of Mary Odel, visits the Indian camp and uses his efforts to bring about an uprising among the Indians as revenge and to further his own ends. In the little cabin of the trapper Daniel assures them there are no fears of the Indian outbreak again; however, he has his own fears, and determines to keep a watchful eye on the fearful redskins.

By accident, the old trapper, who has won the confidence of the Indians, overhears Girty plot the uprising and hastens to give warning. In the meantime the two sisters have left the stockade and gone for a ride in the mountains. Daniel, having joined the logging camp, is ignorant of the impending danger. Mary and her sister enjoying a delightful ride on their favorite mounts, unmindful that Girty, the unwelcome suitor, has already kindled the flame of revolt and carnage. Girty stations his spies in the riders' path and Mary, who is less fortunate than her younger sister, is taken captive.

Daniel learns of the uprising and enlists the woodmen, who prepare for their defense and the recovery of the girl. Warning is sent broadcast and the faithful ones of the cause of humanity, together with their stock, seek refuge in the stockade and prepare to defend themselves against the Indians. Daniel, finding the trail of the scheming Girty, is in hot pursuit. When about to be discovered conceals himself in a large tree, to which Mary is afterwards tied and left under guard of the Indians. While they sleep Daniel effects a miraculous and perilous escape by swinging from the limbs of the tree and releasing Mary, after which he draws her up into the tree for safety.

The Indians awakening find their prey is gone and rush from the scene enraged because of the girl's escape. Daniel and Mary take this opportunity to seek safety in the stockade. Finding a stray unsaddled horse they mount it and ride for their lives, pursued by Girty and his followers. They reach the stockade in the nick of time and its loyal defenders repulse the desperate Girty and his redskins, completing one of the best Indian pictures ever produced by the master builder of western picture subjects.

PATHE FRERES.

"THE CLEVER DOMESTIC."—Jack Fairbanks, who is blessed with poor relations, consents to take the protege of a young cousin from the country into his service as valet. Tommy, the cousin, who has all the freshness of the rube, duly arrives, with his belongings in an enormous basket. He is forthwith furnished with an apron and big feather brush, and is told to go and learn how to do things under the supervision of the stalwart housemaid. But, alas, Tommy is not one of those to whom orthodox methods come easy, and the numerable blunders he commits are the despair of his master. Ultimately, after having seen practically the whole of his home wrecked, the latter perhaps, he thinks Tommy's greenness will be less apparent than in the midst of a civilized community.

"COCOANUT PLANTATION."—A drive through the long avenues of tall cocoanut trees brings us to the very heart of the plantation. Here the natives swiftly climb the trees for the purpose of securing the alcohol. This is put into jars and loaded on to native wagons, which are immediately despatched to the town. The business of gathering the cocoanuts is assigned to native lads, who climb the trees with astonishing rapidity. The nuts are thrown by them to the earth and are picked up and placed in piles by the men standing beneath the trees. Most people are aware of the many uses to which cocoanut fibre is put, and in one of the pictures we see a native taking off the husks of the nuts with the fibre still adhering, merely using as his instrument a sharp-pointed stick. An amusing little picture shows two youngsters impatiently waiting whilst a man pierces a cocoanut for them to drink the milk. A picture of a native cleaning his teeth with a tooth-brush which is manufactured from the cocoanut fibre is also very original.

"AN ANIMATED ARMCHAIR."—Harry Stevens, fresh from college, aspires to the hand of rich Mrs. Thompson's daughter Alice. She is also very youthful and is fascinated by the handsome Harry. Mrs. Thompson, however, will not hear of her daughter marrying yet, and in order to break her infatuation is preparing to take her to Europe. After seeing the covers placed on her furniture, Mrs. Thompson goes out to spend the day bidding farewell to her friends. Alice send a note to Harry that the coast is clear, and tells him to come around. Harry dons his glad rags in a hurry, and leaving his room like a bear garden, is soon around chatting in the parlor with Alice. Time flies, and the maid rushes in to tell them that Mrs. Thompson is entering the house. Escape being impossible, Alice slips over him the cover of an armchair and Harry shapes himself to it. Mrs. Thompson has brought a lady friend with her, and it is with difficulty that Alice gently prevails on her to sit in some other chair than this presumed armchair. Another stouter and heavier friend arriving, however, Alice is not so fortunate, and this mass of avoirdupois plumps into it. With difficulty Harry supports the weight, but cannot keep steady. This attracts the attention of all, and frightened, they rush from the room thinking it is something supernatural. No men are around and they are at a loss what to do. With Alice's assistance Harry climbs out of the window and strolls up past the front of the house. His services are enlisted, and bidding them not to be afraid, he draws out his gun and enters the parlor, leaving the others at the door fearful for his safety. Once inside he hands his revolver to Alice, who fires shot after shot, while at each report he smashes some article of furniture. Mrs. Thompson and her friends are then summoned in and Harry explains that he has laid the spirit. Delighted, Mrs. Thompson considers him her savior, and now on her knees implores him to marry Alice.

Stella's dowry. Stella is fascinated by his polished manner and good looks, and listens to him seriously. There is also staying at the same hotel another suitor for Stella's hand, Henry Cresp. He has known her and her father for some time, and nothing would please the old man better than to have him as a son-in-law. Henry presses his suit, but Stella refuses him, as she is won over by Albert. She introduces the latter to her father, but he is less guileless than she, and perceives that beneath the surface Albert is little better than a rogue, and he tells him in unmistakable terms that he will not consent to his daughter's marriage to him, and that the acquaintance between him and Stella had better end. Albert is furious and writes a note to Stella to meet him at the Gull Rock, threatening to end his life unless he can be sure of her love. Stella keeps the appointment, leaving her father asleep in his bath chair on the sands. She suddenly remembers this, and, wresting herself from her lover's arms, sees the incoming tide mounting to her father's knees. The old gentleman is awakened, but, powerless to stir, can only shout in feeble voice. Fortunately his cries are heard by Henry, who happens to be near enough to clamber down the rocks and dash through the water and rescue him. Stella, who has witnessed the whole scene, yields to impulse and rewards him with her hand and heart.

"HER FIRST HUSBAND'S RETURN."—Helen Thurston is happily married and she lovingly bids her husband George farewell as he starts out on business. Accompanying him to the doorstep she is seen by a seedy-looking individual, who gives a start of surprise and recognition unnoticed by Helen. She returns to her parlor and, gazing at her husband's photo, is dreaming of happiness when this individual enters. She starts as if stung. She recognizes that he is Tom Warren, her first husband. He had years ago been reported killed in a railroad accident. Warren shows her a clipping from a newspaper that corrects this report as erroneous. She is stunned for a moment and then rushes to the telephone. Warren intercepts her and she becomes hysterical. He seems to enjoy her misery, and finally makes a demand for money. She gives him all she has, and fearing to lose George Thurston's love, promises to send more in the morning if only he will go. He agrees to leave on these conditions, and Helen, lowering the light, retires to another room. It is night. A burglar enters by the window, and rummages around the room. He sees the door opening and hides behind a screen. Helen enters and turns up the light. At this moment Warren, suspicious that Helen will not keep her word, also returns and renews his demands for an immediately payment. He shows her their marriage certificate. She struggles to obtain it and the screen is upset and the burglar brought to view. Warren draws his revolver, and in a struggle with the burglar it falls to the ground. Helen seizes the weapon and in a flash has covered both Warren and the other man. She bids the burglar strike a match and burn the certificate in Warren's uplifted hand. He does so. She continues to keep them both covered and orders the burglar to leave by the window. He gladly accepts this ready means of escape. Helen then telephones to the police. Two officers are soon at the house, and pointing to the kit left behind by the real culprit, she hands over Warren as the burglar. At this moment George Thurston enters. Helen explains that she had been disturbed by a burglar and while the police lead Warren off in custody she falls into George's arms.

"SOAP IN HIS EYES."—Smithers is shaving, and has just got his face nicely lathered when his wife comes in and asks him one of those silly questions that wives should take care not to ask while their husbands are wielding the razor. Smithers lets the lather get in his eye, and wifey walks out on hearing the language he uses. Smithers left alone, makes agonized efforts to lay his hands on the towel and some water. He can't find either, and with one eye full of soap and the other watering, he gropes through the flat, overturning tables and knocking down ornaments in his erratic course. Arriving out on the landing, he descends the stairs in a peculiar manner, creating havoc on his way. Arriving at the porch, he comes across the janitor, who, disgusted at being pushed into a bucket of water, retaliates by throwing water over him. The result is not what he expected, for, relieved of his soap, Smithers dances on the sidewalk and showers blessings on the astonished janitor.

In the remodeling of the house Judge Webber carried out his own plans. The front of the theatre and the foyer, with lounge room, are shown in the accompanying illustrations, but the lobby leading from the entrance to the foyer is not. The picture of the foyer shows three archways, the one to the left being used for entrance to the auditorium, the other two being draped by handsome portieres and unused except to serve as exits when there is an exceptionally crowded house.

From late spring until late in the fall an orchestra of 10 pieces is placed in the foyer, while a grand piano and trap drums occupy the customary position in the pit. The latter plays the music for one selected reel of pictures, and the orchestra in the foyer plays the music for the other two, besides rendering up-to-date selections. Manager Webber innovated the foyer orchestra for the purpose of entertaining the people standing in line waiting to get in, as well as the audience inside. During the winter the foyer orchestra is transferred to the pit on account of the air drafts.

Three reels are run daily, 10 first runs being offered each week. Nothing but pictures and instrumental music are programmed. The exhibitions last from 11 o'clock a. m. till 11 p. m The house is illuminated by a large dome light in the center of the ceiling and also by lights along the front of the lower balcony and on the wall separating the auditorium from the foyer. These lights are controlled from the operator's booth, and are extinguished while the pictures are being run. Picture lights are furnished by lamps covered by deep art shades of red color, one in each box, and by a row of lamps, set in deep amber shades about three feet apart and fastened along the lower edge of the front of the second balcony—every alternate lamp only being lit. In addition, on the wall next to the foyer, there is a row of lamps in deep amber and green shades. These latter, Mrs. Karples told me, will be changed to small mission lamps in the near future. No picture lights are used on the side walls. The operator controls all lights from his booth.

The front is beautifully illuminated by 27 large Tungsten lights, in red and green globes, of 60 candle-power each, set around and high above the entrance. Across the entire entrance, immediately above, is a horizontal aperture covered in front by opalescent glass. In this aperture are placed about 30 Tungsten lights of 60 candle-power each, set in brilliant globes. The effect as the light streams through the opalescent glass can be imagined. Remembering that the decorations of the front are in white and green, and that there are red and green and opalescent hues in addition, the sea of bright colors attracts attention far and near by night.

In the lobby a chandelier which bears Tungsten lamps (with a combined candle-power of 2,800) set in illuminated globes lights the way to the foyer, where another similar chandelier is hung.

The interior side walls are decorated in old rose and panels, the latter containing fancy paintings in water colors. Fine upholstered chairs in maroon leather, 1,000 of them, offer luxury and comfort to patrons, while the balconies and gallery are also comfortably appointed. The ventilation is so perfect that the Iris is advertised as "the coolest place in Denver" during summer.

The house is fitted with a fine stage, on which a curtain, 21 by 24 feet, is placed five feet from the back wall. The picture is 17 by 21 feet, and the throw is 85 feet.

Only 5 cents is charged to patrons for a seat in any part of the Iris, first come first served. Sections are reserved in the balconies for foreigners of the lower class and for negroes. On Saturday and Sunday evenings quite a number of ladies and gentlemen may be seen in evening dress. I nearly forgot to state that Mrs. Karpeles reminded me that a set of Deagan's musical bells was installed in the Iris, much to the satisfaction of numerous patrons.

The Edengraph Wins.

A few days ago a hot argument was engaged in at the General Film Co.'s office, 85 Dearborn street, by George Hines of the Lydia theatre, John Miller of the Glamour and John Bell of the Bell theatre, as to which one of the three projected the finest pictures and, incidentally, as to which of them had the best machine. George Hines bet a five dollar hat with John Bell and a five dollar dinner with John Miller that he had the best picture machine, and that he projected the clearest, steadiest and most flickerless pictures. The bets were accepted and the three contestants agreed to be the judges, arranging to attend an exhibition at each house, in succession, three reels to be run off.

The Bell theatre was the first visited and all left highly pleased, but Hines whispered to Johnnie Bell, "You lose." Then the Glamour, in Englewood, was taken in. There all went well and John Miller smiled a smile of confidence at Hines, as much as to say, "Now, where are you at?" Hines, nowise abashed, laughingly said, "You also lose; come with me to the Lydia."

There "Pharoah, or Israel in Egypt" (Gaumont) was first presented, and at its close the audience applauded vigorously, which caused Bell and Miller to exchange glances of surprise. Next came "No Place Like Home" (Selig), and as the closing scenes were viewed, Bell and Miller exclaimed, "Come on, George, you win."

The bets were duly settled the following day, and John Miller at the same time purchased a new Edengraph machine at 85 Dearborn street, F. C. Aiken, manager of the General Film Co., putting up the cigars, as he thanked George Hines for bringing about the sale. George has always considered the Edengraph a world-beater and is now more cocky than ever.

He Got Hit Hard.

The publicity department of the Selig Polyscope Co. has had quite a laugh over the following letter, received the other day from a certain gentleman in Crawfordsville, Ind., who is the ex-manager of a picture theatre in that city:

"Why do you abuse my patience longer with those abominable announcements of film releases?

" 'Tis true; I was in the picture show business at one time, but am trying to live it down —with fair prospects of success, if you will but save me from the clutches of your mailing clerk.

"Yours in desperation."

Chicago Film Brevities.

J. E. Pearce, of the Imported Film & Supply Co. of New Orleans, spent a day in the city last week. Mr. Pearce informed me that the state health board of Louisiana is at present touring the entire state in a special car, exhibiting the "Fly Pest" film and the Edison "Milk" film. Able lectures on both subjects are given by members of the health department. The newspapers have devoted a great deal of space both to the films and lectures.

I have just received from the Essanay publicity department the first issue of the new leaflet, printed-on-one-side bulletin of that firm. It is handsome and attractive and will be a great aid to the exhibitor when placed in the lobby of the theatre. The illustrations are clear and artistic, the title of each subject is in large, bold type, and the descriptive matter is set in type that can be easily read. The paper used is of excellent quality. Altogether the new Essanay bulletin strikes me as being the most attractive I have yet seen.

Mr. Seaver, owner of the Alcazar and other theatres in this city and elsewhere, is building a new house at Diversey Boulevard and Clark street. It will be a beautiful theatre and it is expected it will be in readiness to open about New Year's day or Christmas.

Stanton & Quimby will shortly open their new house, the Idle Hour, in Dowagiac, Mich. They were in the city last week arranging with the American branch of the General Film Co. at 77 South Clark street for service. Mr. VanRonkel tells me that the American branch of the G. F. Co. showed a net gain of five starting Monday, November 28. These new additions are all booked for high class service.

A. F. Reitzel, of La Crosse, Wis., where he ran a dry goods department store for fifteen years, was in the city last week looking for a first class vaudeville or picture theatre. Mr. Reitzel will either purchase or lease. He is going into the picture business after considering the proposition for the past year. Mr. Reitzel prefers to locate in Chicago. His address is 324 South 10th street, La Crosse, Wis. Licensed business in La Crosse is very prosperous, according to Mr. Reitzel.

Mr. Clipsen, formerly labor editor of the Inter-Ocean, this city, and for some time connected with the William Morris Co., recently purchased the Banner theatre, on Robey, North avenue and Milwaukee avenue, from J. L. Chadsey. The Banner is considered one of the best paying houses in the city. It will seat 800 people and is located in the midst of a fine neighborhood. It was originally built for vaudeville, but a great deal of money was lost by offering that form of entertainment. Since high class motion pictures and illustrated songs were introduced the Banner has brought large profits to its owners. The Banner shows three good reels daily, and gets service from the General Film Co., 85 Dearborn street.

W. B. Gandy, manager of the Dreamland, Lima, O., visited the G. F. Co. at 85 Dearborn street, last week. Mr. Gandy reports excellent results and states that he has installed a new mirror screen, which has greatly helped his business. The Dreamland seats 300 people.

HER INDIAN MOTHER

A Kalem Canadian Romance

MANY stories have been written of white men who have married Indian women during a protracted sojourn in the wilds only to cast them off when opportunity came to permit their return to civilization. This theme has been the motif of dramatic productions which have had long and successful runs. It is quite logical that it should provide the plot for a motion picture, which accounts for the use of the idea by the Kalem players in a picture entitled "Her Indian Mother."

As the story goes a factor of the famous Hudson Bay Company living at one of the company's posts far from civilization falls in love with a beautiful Indian girl and buys her from her father for a pack of furs, which is according to the Indian custom. The man seems to be devoted to his Indian wife and a child is born to them; but one day a message comes ordering the factor to report at the company's office in Montreal and he goes away.

After vainly waiting for three years for her white husband to return, the Indian wife returns to her father's teepee in the forest. The man continues with the company at Montreal, and is finally promoted to the position of general manager. By this time he has become gray in the company's service, and has forgotten his Indian wife and child back in the wilderness.

Business calling him to the distant post he sees his daughter, whom he recognizes by a bracelet which he gave the child's mother when he married her. She is now a beautiful girl and the father is so pleased with her that he decides to take her back to Montreal with him. Going to the old Indian grandfather, he leaves his horse in exchange for the girl and takes her away with him.

When next we see her she is presiding at her father's home, a beautiful young woman and apparently satisfied with her surroundings. But, at this point of the story, a friend of the father comes in from the wilderness, bringing with him an Indian belt such as is worn by the squaws, which he displays. The girl gets possession of it and at the first opportunity slips away to her room to examine it. With the belt in her hands all the longing for the old life in the forest returns. Divesting herself of the garb of civilization she dons her Indian costume and quietly steals out of the house to take up the long trail to the wilderness. As she nears the home of her tribe she is met by her Indian lover and returns to his teepee.

Realizing that his daughter has gone back to her people, the father follows and finds her with her lover. He attempts to persuade her to return, but fails and rides away and out of her life finally. The girl, happy in her love for the young Indian, lets the father go without a regret.

It is a picture of much merit, being well acted and full of beautiful scenic effects.

SCENE FROM KALEM SUBJECT "HER INDIAN MOTHER."

REIFF WILL MANAGE IDEL A WHILE.

Harry E. Reiff, the well-known Pittsburg photoplay singer of Pittsburg, Pa., has taken over the eheatre on Boggs avenue, known as the "Idel a While," and after putting in some extensive repairs, will make that house one of the best in the city.

Mr. Reiff is one of the best known picture men in the "Smoky Burg," having been in the business for a number of years. It is his intention of running only the latest and most up-to-date films and use the latest songs, which he will sing himself.

ANOTHER LADY PHOTOPLAY MANAGER.

Miss Eleanor Brooke, a well-known society woman of Mena, Ark., has leased a house on DeQueen street, and is transforming that building into a modern photoplay theatre. It is the purpose of Miss Brooks to run only the latest pictures obtainable, and the patrons of her house will see how great educational subjects are treated through the films.

She will call her house the Unique Theatre and will give picture exhibitions every afternoon and evening. The house will be ready for its initial performance within the next two weeks.

PROVINCIAL POLICE TO CENSOR FILMS.

The motion picture men of Toronto, Canada, are still in hot pursuit of the local authorities about the censoring of motion picture films. At present, the picture men are at loss to know what films they dare run, as they are, at any time, liable to be prevented after they have had the picture advertised. It was recently reported that the commission of three men were to be selected to censor all films that should be run in Toronto, but this is denied by Col. Matheson.

It is now understood some officer of the Provincial police will be detailed for this work, and that his decision will hold good. While this manner of censoring does not come up to what the picture men would like to have, nevertheless, it is an improvement over present conditions.

KINNARD'S HOUSE NEARLY READY TO OPEN.

Fred Kinnard's new photoplay theatre on Rae avenue, Paterson, N. J., is near completion. The house will be one of the most modern in New Jersey and, when completed, the Paterson picture lovers will have a chance to see the latest films.

The house will be most artistically decorated, and the chairs will be all upholstered. Large and airy dressing rooms are being provided for the vaudeville artists. It is expected the house will open Dec. 1.

NEW PHOTOPLAY HOUSE FOR SHAMOKIN, PA.

Workmen are making rapid progress on Shamokin's new photoplay theatre, and expect to have the place ready for business before Dec. 1.

The latest theatre is located in the Chester-McWilliams building, and will be the largest and one of the most up-to-date amusement places of its kind in the city. This, with the Savoy theatre, will give to Shamokin seven theatrical houses, quite a record for a city the size of Shamokin. And all are well patronized.

MUSICAL BELLS

Twenty-five of our Musical Bells mounted on the wall and played from keyboard, make a hit everywhere. No picture house complete without a set. $75 is the price for the complete outfit, ready to install.

DICKENS' CHRISTMAS CAROL

Beautifully Done in Pictures by the Edison Players

WHO has not read Charles Dickens' immortal Christmas story, "A Christmas Carol"? Who does not know "Old Scrooge" and Bob Cratchit and "Tiny Tim"? Inseparably linked with Christmas lore these creatures of the story teller's imagination have become almost creatures of flesh and blood, and we recognize them in real life under other names. To have them presented to us in the semblance of life by the motion picture is like meeting old acquaintances. It is this familiarity with the subject that lends a charm to the Edison picture version of "A Christmas Carol" and arouses a deep sympathy for all human kind so graphically represented by the characters of the story. of the excellent results that have been obtained. The quality of the acting is beyond criticism; careful and painstaking to the least detail, bringing out the dramatic points in a manner calculated to grip and hold the interest of the observer. Clear, sharp photography characterizes the picture from start to finish, and the intelligent manipulation in the double and triple exposures leaves nothing to be desired in the mechanical effects.

The intense heart interest that characterizes the story has not suffered in the pictured interpretation. If anything, the picture really interprets and makes more real the thought that the author sought to convey when he wrote "A Christmas Carol."

SCENES FROM EDISON CHRISTMAS SUBJECT "A CHRISTMAS CAROL."

A more fitting subject for a Christmas picture could scarcely be chosen, though its adequate presentation in motion pictures is attended with many difficulties. Yet the advancement of the art of the photographer has made seeming difficulties simple, and effects have been obtained in the picture that would be impossible to obtain in any other manner. Scrooge, it will be remembered, after a particularly grouchy day at his office, is taken in hand by the ghost of Marley, his old partner. Marley is brought on the scene, chains and all, and he is really ghostly. This effect is produced by double exposure of the negative, and the work has been so accurately timed as to produce the most ghostly effect imaginable. The same is true of the Ghost of Christmas, Past and Present, which successively appear to Scrooge to point out to him the error of his life.

Credit must be given to the Edison producers and players for the intelligent and painstaking effort which is plainly evident throughout this picture. Though the adaptation is a free one and some liberties have been taken with the original story—necessary in order to keep within the limit of a reel of film, yet the picture story is so well put together that the theme is brought to its logical conclusion without noticeable emendations.

Especially good is the personation of Scrooge. The Edison player to whom this part fell is a character impersonator of unusual ability. He has presented Scrooge in all his grasping, grinding nature. But for all that one cannot help feeling sorry for the old fellow that he should be so insensible to the amenities of the season. It is this feeling of sympathy that eventually overcomes one when Scrooge finally experiences a change of heart, and one fairly rejoices with him as he goes about dispensing Christmas cheer.

To those who understand the technicalities of picture making, this picture will appeal because

SELIG'S "THE COUNTRY FAIR."

Abbey. He also is a slave to the spinster's charms and offers his hand and a release of the mortgage in case she accepts him for a husband. His offer is spurned, and as he is threatening her with all the vials of the law, Otis enters and throws him out.

The haying scene that follows is a perfect picture of farm life, with Aunt Abbey and Otis as prominent figures, while "Taggs" cuts her capers and fairly revels amid her new surroundings. The "huskin' bee" is another delightful glimpse of rural sport(and we see Otis, who has drawn the red ear of corn, claiming and taking a kiss from Miss Abbey. Then the farm dance is engaged in by all hands, making an animated and joyous scene, which is blighted by the reappearance of the constable with his hated legal papers.

And now Tim resolves to enter the thoroughbred in the race at the County fair, the winner of which will be awarded $1,500, Otis being let into the secret from the start. The wagon, crowded with pleasure seekers, is seen leaving the farm, with the thoroughbred, Cold Molasses," led in the rear. Next we approach the entrance to the fair grounds and pass in and view the sights, before the race is started.

The great event is announced by a view of the packed grand stand and of the most spirited race that has ever been filmed. "Cold Molasses," who has been five lengths behind, all the way, until the home stretch is reached, forges ahead and is proclaimed the victor by a neck. The Abbey farm is saved, and "Cold Molasses" shows his contempt for the constable's papers by eating them up after the $1,500 has been paid to old Hammerhead.

NEW HOUSE FOR CONNELLSVILLE, PA.

Connellsville is to have a new photoplay theatre built on a new idea. It will be called "The Globe," and is at present in course of construction in the building formerly occupied by Glotfelty's restaurant on North Pittsburg street. The Keystone Planing Mill Company has the contract and has been engaged on the work for the past four weeks.

Those interested in the new proposition are Roy and Earl Clabaugh, proprietors of "The Nickelet," and H. A. and W. W. Glotfelty. Already over $2,400 has been invested in the building and it is expected that the theatre will cost over $3,000 before it is completed. Plans have been made for the opening about December 1, though when work was first started it was planned to be ready in time for Thanksgiving.

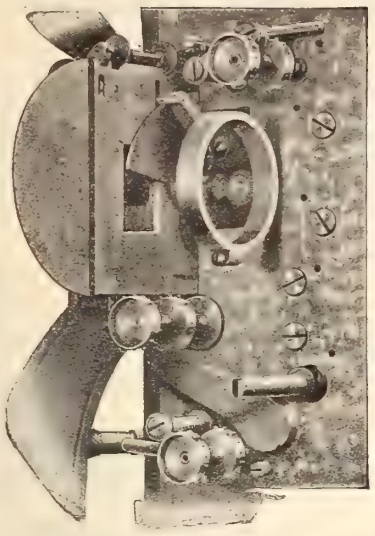
A PHENOMENAL GROWTH.

The Exhibitors Advertising & Specialty Co., of which Arthur D. Jacobs, of Jacobs' Bronx Theatre, and Ben Title, of Title's New Flat Theatre, are respectively President, Secretary and Treasurer, has now leased the entire floor in the United Cigar Stores building at 105 East 14th street, New York City, which is right at the entrance to the subway. This business was incorporated by the two above named exhibitors only about six months ago, and from desk room in the rear of a licensed exchange their business has grown by leaps and bounds to its present status and bids fair to become quite a lusty infant before it is a year old.

It seems to be the consensus of opinion among exhibitors who have expressed themselves in their first visit to the offices and showrooms of the above concern that it fills a long-felt want, as here the exhibitor can get anything he wants to advertise his business, whether it be an A. B. C. or Selig or Vitagraph poster or stock poster of various kinds, or a handsome lithographed frame to adorn his lobby or various snipes; in fact, anything to boost his show and increase his box office receipts.

This concern has scoured the entire country from all over the United States to secure everything they can get hold of in the way of good advertising matter for lobby display and for advertising motion picture theatres. In addition to this they have gotten up various ideas and original matter of their own design and creation, notable among which is the handsome lithographed frames for posters, a cut of which has been appearing in our advertising columns, which gives but a faint idea of the real beauty and attractiveness of these lithographed frames which are handsomely gotten up in different color schemes and are classy enough to be placed on the boards of the finest picture theatres. They also are getting out a large number of snipes with various catchy sayings especially adapted for motion picture theatres, and have recently added a department for printing handbills, dodgers, cards, half sheets, full sheets, etc.

They have also added another department, presided over by Mr. Irving Title, formerly one of the proprietors of the "House of Fun," Prospect Ave, Bronx. In this department is carried a full line of electrical supplies, all kinds of carbons of both direct and alternating current, for machines and arc lamps, and all kinds of parts for motion picture machines. Exhibitors would do well to note the address and either call or communicate with this concern



No Dust Can Enter

You know what a saving this means on every part of a machine.

Dust Wears Away the Best Metal

Even the Phosphor-Bronze and Steel Gears we use (they are the best metal we can possibly obtain) cannot stand against dust; therefore, we have eliminated that trouble by using a dust-proof steel case for the mechanism. Also note star and cam running in oil.

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.
De Witt C. Wheeler.

"WHERE THE DESERT MEETS THE NILE."—Lyrics and music by J. R. Shannon; published by Grinnell Bros., Detroit, Mich. Mr. Shannon is the popular writer of Grinnell Brothers, who is well known because of his successful and out-of-the-ordinary compositions "My Spanish Rose," "My Old Girl," etc. The slides for this song are of the scenic kind. They give us excellent views of the Sierra and Nile. and are posed in gorgeous native costumes that afford a study in color.

"MY ROSE FROM THE GARDEN OF LOVE."—Words by Jesse M. Glick; music by Irving M. Wilson; published by M. Witmark & Sons, New York. This song, Edith Mote's big success in vaudeville, has had such a wonderful sale so far that the publishers predict it another "Love Me and the World is Mine." Indeed, if anything were needed to aid its success, the slides alone would effect that result. Posed in colonial costume amidst flowers and bowers. they will afford an imposing presentation on any screen.

Scott & Van Altena.

"LOVE ME WITH YOUR BIG BLUE EYES."—Words and music by Kendis and Paley; published by Kendis and Paley, New York. A song of the appealing type, illustrated with a novelty set of slides that is both original and clever.

"KISS ME, MY HONEY, KISS ME."—Words by Irving Berlin; music by Ted Snyder; published by Ted Snyder Co., New York. This author's name on a song is proof enough of its excellence. Of the slides too much cannot be said. The model is she who posed in last week's release, "I Wouldn't Give My Heart to Anyone But You;" she whom we spoke so highly of in the description of that song. Her ability as a model is unquestionable, and the gift nature has bestowed on her—beauty—adorns every slide in which she appears.

"YOU CAN WIN ME—IF YOU'LL WOO ME—WHILE WE WALTZ."—Words by Sylvester Maguire; music by Alfred Solman; published by Jos. W. Stern & Co., New York. That this set of slides is a brilliant piece of workmanship will be self-evident to those who have followed closely the progress in this line of work. Extraordinarily good posing by models whose likenesses reproduce to excellent advantage is bound to make this set applauded by all audiences.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"AS DEEP AS THE DEEP BLUE SEA."—By H. W. Petrie, author of "Asleep In the Deep," "Down In the Deep Let Me Sleep When I Die;" published by the House of Haviland. A beautiful ballad of great poetic and musical merit. Simpson has made a meritorious set of slides for this popular hit, showing exquisite marine views and the sailor boy and his sweetheart in typical surroundings. Scenes on vessels, etc.

"KELLY'S GONE TO KINGDOM COME."—Words by Sax Rohmer; music by T. W. Thurban; published by Will Rossiter. The song that Maude Lambert, the dainty comedienne, featured in Lew Field's "Midnight Sons." In the slides Simpson has shown a real aeroplane, Kelly under the ocean, Kelly in an airship, and any number of humorous situations. Most of these pictures were made during the recent International Aviation Meet.

Levi Company, Inc.

"WAITING FOR A LITTLE GIRLIE."—Words by Stanley Murphy; music by Benjamin Hapgood Burt; published by Shapiro. A very clever little song with good lyrics and a beautiful melody. The slides contain a great many novelties, all artistically made and from local expression of opinion it is one of the best sets ever turned out by Levi.

"DON'T WAKE ME UP, I AM DREAMING."—Words by Beth Slater Whitson; music by Herbert Ingraham, writer of "Roses Bring Dreams of You," "You Are the Ideal of My Dreams" and "All That I Ask is Love." This is his next ballad, and judging from the melody it will undoubtedly prove as big a sensation as its predecessors. Shapiro is the publisher. The Levi Co. have made a special effort on the slides and the result has been more than satisfactory. Beautiful scenery, excellent models and good photography.

Excelsior Slide Co.

"SWEET ANNA LIZE."—Words by Bartley Costello; music by Henry I. Marshall; published by Ted Snyder. A tuneful love ballad with a fascinating movement that should appeal to lovers of this class of music. Appropriate illustrations by Excelsior.

"DER DEUTSCHE RAG."—Words by Sam M. Lewis; music by B. O. Bennet; published by the music house of Laemmle. This is something on the lively order that goes well once in a while.

NEW PHOTOPLAY HOUSE IN FLATBUSH.

Mr. Wm. R. Lusher, Dorchester Road and Coney Island Avenue, Flatbush, Brooklyn, N. Y., will in a few days open his new "Dorchester" Photoplay Theatre, and people in that section of Brooklyn will have a theatre in their midst equipped in every detail with the most up-to-date motion picture apparatus. Mr. Lusher has spared no expense to furnish his patrons with every comfort and convenience; his operating booth is equipped with two 1910 Model Motiographs with Hallberg Electric Automatic Economizers, and in front of the theatre in place of incandescent or Flame Arc lights, Mr. Lusher has installed a large electric sign reading DORCHESTER, each of the letters being 12 inches in height. This sign is some thing entirely new in this country. Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," is now importing them from England. The beautiful effect of this sign must be seen to be appreciated; besides its operation means a saving of 70% in current consumption over the ordinary incandescent lamp sign.

Extensive improvements are under way at the Century Theatre, South Bend, Ind., chief of which is the erection of a canopy over the entrance on Second street. Workmen are busy building the structure, which will be of iron and glass and will be lighted with over one hundred electric lights.

MORE IMPORTANT POWER'S INSTALLATIONS.

The State Agricultural and Industrial School, at Industry, Monroe County, N. Y., has just purchased through the Victor Film Service, Buffalo, N. Y., a Power's Cameragraph No. 5.

During the past few months many schools and colleges have adopted motion pictures as a means of assisting in the education of their pupils.

Mr. J. E. Miller has just completed a very fine motion picture theatre at the southeast corner of Lenox avenue and 143d street, New York City, and purchased through the General Film Co., 219 6th avenue, New York, a Power's Cameragraph No. 6. He decided on the Power's No. 6 after a careful investigation of the merits of all makes of machines.

A GREAT WHITE WAY

for 75c. per day. This small sum will run two ALBA Flame Arc Lamps for five hours. They will flood the front of your Theatre and the adjacent street with a volume of attractive light (equal to 4000 incandescent lamps) that will prove an irresistible magnet for pleasure seekers for blocks in each direction.

They will surround your theatre with an atmosphere of good cheer that will make passers-by want to pass in.

LEADING AMERICAN EXPONENT OF THE PHOTOPLAY

Published Weekly by the Films Publishing Co., at No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City

STRONG APPEAL IN PATHE CHRISTMAS SUBJECT

American Company of Players Blend Human Emotions With Telling Effect—Impressive Lesson In Charity.

MANY Christmas pictures have been made; some with benevolent Santa Clauses and reindeers and some without; some have had Christmas trees with great stacks of toys and apples and oranges and nuts, and happy kiddies have frolicked about in cute little pajamas, all of which took most of the grown-ups back to the happy, care-free days of childhood, and was a present reality to many of the children.

Most of these Christmas pictures have been works of art. We mentioned one in these pages last week that is a picture classic and which possesses absorbing heart interest. Of the one regarding which we are now to write there is an added interest which entitled it to a place by itself among motion pictures.

Of the special educational subjects released during the past year, that have attracted general notice because of their utility, were "The Fly Pest" picture which aided the fight to suppress the germ carrying house fly; then the "Milk Picture," which has helped a lot to improve the methods of producing and handling the milk supply. Another picture, recently released, will further the fight against disease, all of which causes are important and deserving.

These several pictures mentioned were made with a definite purpose in mind and almost, one might say, to order.

Now comes a picture—a Christmas picture—made in the course of the day's work, with no especial purpose or design beyond the general purpose of amusing the millions who patronize the photoplay; yet, it seems to us to be one of the strongest appeals for Christian giving that it has been our privilege to observe. The picture is from the Pathe American studios and will soon be released under the title "Sunshine in Poverty Row." It is greatly to be regretted that it is not now in the hand of the theatre managers, for it could not fail to bring to many a merrier Christmas than may be their privilege to enjoy. Advantageously shown this picture could not fail to pull from plethoric purses that which has power to make glad the heart and lighten the burden. It also teaches a lesson in charity which may well be learned by self-seeking men and women who know little, and care less, of how the other half lives.

For the scenes of "Sunshine in Poverty Row" the producer did not go far afield. A nearby village provided the setting. Nor would one have to stretch one's imagination to find the counterpart in real life, and that is what is so appealing about the picture—it shows you something that you know is true and that something touches the sympathetic side of your nature, pulls at your heart strings and, if your heart is in the right place, it will loosen your purse strings also.

The time is the day before Christmas, and two little tots are gazing wistfully at a shop window filled with toys. The picture takes you to their home—and what a bare, cheerless home it is. The mother is sick and in bed; the father is without work, penniless and disheartened. The stamp of dire poverty is everywhere. Hope has fled from all, for we are shown the children preparing a letter to Santa Claus and we realize that in their innocent hearts hope yet abides, and faith.

The little tots mail their letter and the postman gets it from the letter-box and takes it to the office. Here the postmaster gets it and tucks it in his vest pocket. That night while he and his wife ar trimming a tree for their own daughter the letter comes to light again. At once the postmaster and his wife decide to play Santa Claus and with an armful of toys they set out.

At the house in Poverty Row we are shown the little ones hanging up their stockings and going to bed to dream of Santa and lots of presents.

CASUAL COMMENT

GOADED to desperation by the knowledge that their Pecksniffian pretense has finally been publicly unmasked by The Film Index, the editors of The Moving Picture World reveal the depths of their degradation in a page of vituperation, spite and impotent rage against The Index and its employees.

Whatever the opinions of the agitated Old Ladies of the M. P. World may be concerning the individuals named none cares so little as those same individuals. All that is beside the question and a clumsy, childish attempt to dodge the real issue, to wit: Is the Moving Picture World really a trade newspaper, or is it a common, ordinary "holdup" proposition? There are a number of these shady publications in New York—sometimes known by an uglier term.

But to consider the real question: It is safe to eliminate the term "newspaper" from any description of the M. P. World that might be given, since it prints nothing that is new. This leaves only the item "trade paper," which item we are willing to concede, with only the question of character to debate.

IN the early days of trade journalism the trade paper was generally characterized as a blackmailing proposition. Manufacturers and dealers who were so unfortunate as to come within the field of vision of a trade paper in those days hastened, if they were weak and wise, to take advertising space in its columns; but if they were foolish and strong they stayed out. It cost these latter a pretty penny sometimes, but they saved their self-respect.

Of course, what the trade paper said about them and the things they made didn't read like a raphsody on spring—it was a "rap" of another sort; very much the same sort of stuff you may read about the licensed manufacturers every week in the Moving Picture World.

FAR be it from us to say, or even hint, that the Moving Picture World would stoop to blackmail, or to say unkind things about a manufacturer of pictures that did not advertise in its columns. Yet there is that "long arm of coincidence" that gives the situation an ugly aspect.

For nearly two years the licensed manufacturers patronized the Moving Picture World. During all that time does any one remember that it had the least word to say against "the trust" or the Edison patents, or any of the plans proposed by far-seeing business men to save the motion picture business from demoralization and bankruptcy?

You will search its columns in vain for an untoward utterance. Not a word of criticism will be found in its columns while it was receiving money from the licensed manufacturers.

Now it happens that the advertisements of the licensed manufacturers are withdrawn from the Moving Picture World. Why we do not know; it may have been that the licensed manufacturers wanted to try out the Moving Picture World; to see how far it could be trusted to represent the whole trade without being subsidized, and maybe they had other reasons.

Whatever may have been the reason they were not kept waiting long to find out where the Moving Picture World stood. First, you will remember, there was that blackfaced type announcement in the M. P. World calling attention to the absence of certain advertisements from its columns, and the explanation that the absence was caused by a refusal to extend further credit to the absentees.

No names were mentioned—you could draw your own inference.

Following that notice—which was printed twice—began the present series of attacks upon the Edison patents, upon Mr. Edison himself, upon the Motion Pictures Patents Company and upon the product of the licensed manufacturers, individually and collectively.

Is it not passing strange, after meekly supporting these various interests for the greater part of two years; after repeatedly commending the measures and the men back of them for their efforts to protect and to build up the business to its present profitable basis, that the Moving Picture World should suddenly discover that the measures are iniquitious and the men mercenary?

All that following so quickly upon the heels of the withdrawal of the subsidy, too.

What must the licensed manufacturers think of that action? What would any business man think of it? What do you think of it?

It is a journalistic reversion to type of the worst sort and quite unmistakable, and "demonstrates how low the profession of an editor can sink" and drag his publication with him.

THUS has the editor of the Moving Picture World "finally and irrevocably placed" himself and his paper. He has condemned himself out of his own mouth; proved beyond the shadow of a doubt that for nearly two years he was "subsidized," "purchased," "prostituted" by the dominant interests, the "perfidious and predatory trust."

Either he was all that or he is trifling with the truth now. And that is what we started out to make plain to our readers when we handed him that little story about the "Ox and the Frog." It was the "bait" and he took it, "hook, bob and sinker."

THE editor of our esteemed contemporay affects to wash his hands. He has need, but the "damned spot," wash it as he will, will not out.

The dominant interests he did not deceive. Neither will he deceive the so-called "independent interests" whose cause he now affects to espouse. They have his number and for him it is written:

"Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin."

WE are disappointed; we had every assurance that we would get a lesson in French from the Alphabeticised Editor of the M. P. World last week, but all he gives us is a promise, and hies himself away to criticise (save the term) a Thanhauser picture.

J'ai mal de tete,
J'ai mal de tete,
Curses on the awful fate.
I'll praise that verb and get it straight
Or, bally thing, I'll bust the slate.
J'ai mal de tete,
J'ai mal de tete.

REFORM RAMPANT

An ordinance, just passed by the City Council of Los Angeles, Cal., contains a special clause regulating the display of motion pictures and other posters. The ordinance prohibits the inclusion of deadly weapons of any kind in the pictorial work, or the depiction of the commission of any criminal acts. Any violation of these provisions will be punishable by fine and imprisonment.

In years long past, the stories told
Always had a pirate bold
Who held maids captive in the hold
And gave his pursuers the slip;
With ruthless glee great galleons sank,
Roared "Yo Ho," and strong rum drank,
And made his victims walk the plank
And then he scuttled the ship.

But this was in our tender youth
Before these tales were deemed pernicious.
Reformers now have found the truth—
The stories simply made us vicious.

The childhood picture-books we knew
Always showed a youth that slew
A giant with a head or two—
All dripping with gore was his sword—
He didn't seem to mind the mess;
Rescued damsels in distress,
And—tortured gnomes 'til they'd confess
The place where their wealth was stored.

But this was very long ago,
And, if the pictures still existed,
The children now, you surely know,
Would have their morals badly twisted.

Then plays we saw where pallid wives
In their bosoms kept long knives
To save their grieving, harried lives
When proudly the villain they'd spurn.
The villain laughed; the woman cried;
Shots rang out; the villain died;
The woman sobbed or softly sighed
With joy at the hero's return.

But lurid flash and gleaming steel
No longer make our natures hideous,
Since sweet reform has made us feel
That they're corruptive, vile, insidious.

Reform is rampant, ceaseless, rabid,
Stirring up great agitation;
We must protect and keep our virile
Youth from truth's contamination.
Rhodomontades, heedless, vapid;
Caluminous, excoriation;
Would make our entertainment sterile
By futile, frenzied legislation.

J. L. MURRAY.

Mr. John Snider, owner of the Edisonia, Charlotte, N. C., is preparing to open another picture theatre in that city. This will give Charlotte four high-class picture shows.

The postmaster and his wife arrive at Poverty Row and leave not only the presents for the children but a promise of better times for the father and mother. It is done so naturally and the effect is so happy that you will feel a strong desire to do something of the kind yourself.

Clever acting and good photography combine to make this subject one of exceptional merit. By means of "double exposure" the little girl's dream of Santa Claus bringing the presents is made quite real, lending increased interest to the picture. Other incidents, not mentioned in this commentary, serve to drive home the lesson of the picture making it a powerful lesson on charity.

MAX HAS APPENDICITIS.

Everyone knows Max Linder, Pathe's celebrated comedian, and all will be sorry to hear that he was suddenly seized with a bad attack of appendicitis. He was operated on and our readers will be glad to hear that he is progressing favorably towards convalescence. It is typical of Max, notwithstanding his intense sufferings, that when the surgeon came to operate he said, "I am not afraid, I am used to operators" (a word which in French means both the surgeon and the man in charge of the camera), and of these latter of course Max knows a good many. Then before finally abandoning himself to the chloroform, he familiarly reproached the surgeon for neglecting to have the operation filmed. Those who know Max state that this is a true story, for Max is wrapped up in motography, and is always ready to spring a joke on that subject.

CAPT. AMENT WILL BUILD THEATRE.

According to the plans of Capt. A. D. Ament, proprietor of the Elite theatre, Jackson, Tenn., that city will soon have a new theatre, in which will be seen the best of vaudeville and motion pictures. Ever since Capt. Ament started his string of photoplay theatres he has been very successful, and he now thinks it's about time for him to put up larger and better houses.

Capt. Ament claims that the south is a great country of the motion pictures and that so long as the best are put before the public, business in Dixie will be a great center for that kind of amusement.

NEW MACHINE AT GRAND THEATRE.

The Grand Theatre, South Bend, Ind., has been greatly enhanced as a place of amusement by the installation of a new flickerless and fireproof motion picture machine. This has been made to overcome the disagreeable flickering which is a great strain on the eyes.

With two good pictures a test was given the new machine at the regular shows and proved satisfactory. The pictures were commended as the clearest that have ever been seen here.

Mgr. Sybert since becoming owner of the Grand has spared no expense in making it a comfortable and entertaining place of amusement and it is now one of the most up-to-date picture shows of the state.

The picture shows around Birmingham, Ala., report good business, but Sam Pearle, manager of Pastime Theatre, is most enthusiastic, due to the excellent films he is projecting.

E. M. Newman, a well known traveling lecturer, gave a most interesting travel lecture at Pabst Theatre, Milwaukee, Wis., last week. Many of his subjects were illustrated by motion pictures.

EXCURSION TO THE SPREEWALD

Kalem will Release a Charming Comedy Subject Picturing That Region

WHEN the Kalem Company sent its players abroad to make pictures it was an experiment regarding which many doubts were entertained. Results have proved that the venture was a profitable one, at least from an advertising point of view, for it is a long time since the Kalem Company has produced a picture that has called forth such a spontaneous burst of applause as "The Lad from Old Ireland," recently released. So pleased are exhibitors over that picture that the mails have not been fast enough to convey their appreciation—they have been burning up the wires with messages of congratulation. So much for "The Lad from Old Ireland."

VIEW OF KALEM PLAYERS AND PEASANTRY IN THE SPREEWALD.

The second picture of the series is soon to be released under the title "The Little Spreewald Maiden." This is a comedy built on a similar plan as the Irish picture, only it is the girl that is the heroine this time, and a mighty clever little heroine she is, too. Another feature of the picture is the glimpse it gives us of a comparatively unknown corner of the world. The Spreewald country is south of Berlin, and life in that region is quite primitive. Quaint manners and customs of the people are interesting in the extreme.

In the first scene of the picture we are shown the boats—a sort of flat-boat or punt—which are used to carry freight and passengers from place to place, and are propelled along the little streams or canals by means of a long pole.

Frieda, the Spreewald maiden, appears in the second scene, leaning over the garden gate, very much out of sorts. She is discontented with her lot and, when her lover comes along she tells him of her desire to go to America, of which wonderful country she has heard. In another scene is shown the peasants digging what looks to be potatoes; among them is the maiden, not at all in love with her work. Later, we see her propelling a great wheelbarrow through the streets of the village. Here she is accosted by two American women who offer to take her to America. The maiden is pleased with the suggestion and tells her lover, who happens along. It is her desire to go to the new country and earn money and then to come back and get married. The plan appeals to the peasant lover and he consents. There is an affectionate leave taking as the party board one of the quaint passenger punts and are poled away.

When we next see the Spreewald maiden she is employed as a nurse girl on Riverside Drive, in New York, her attention divided between the baby and her books—for she is ambitious to learn the English language. She makes progress, for when we see her again it is in a school for stenography where she is busily pounding a typewriter. During this scene a messenger arrives with a request for a girl to take a position, and the manager hands it to our heroine, who goes out to her first job.

Just how long she stays there is not explained, but she makes good with her employer and when she resigns to go back to the Fatherland and her peasant lover, her employer tempts her with an offer of marriage. She rejects the offer, though, and goes back to the Spreewald.

Things don't look the same to her at home when she arrives. She has acquired American ways and the customs of the home folk seem crude. Even her lover has not the charm that he once had. She stands it for a few days, evidently determined to keep her promise, but one day she catches her lover kissing another girl. This is the last straw; the Spreewald has no further charm and she returns to America, glad to get back. A hearty welcome is given her at the office where she was formerly employed and, her old employer having called for the stenographer, she begs the chance to take his dictation. Quietly slipping into his private office she takes a seat behind the man who is busy at his desk and proceeds to make notes of his dictation. Soon he turns around and recognition follows. Evidently the man renews his proposal, for the little Spreewald maiden snuggles into his arms just as though she belonged there—and perhaps she did.

MISS GAUNTIER IN SPREEWALD COSTUME.

The comedy of the subject is charming. Miss Gauntier does the part of the Spreewald maiden as though she had been born to the manor. Sydney Olcott is a capital peasant lover, and the rest of the Kalem players fit into their parts very properly. Good scenes, good photography and good acting should make the "Little Spreewald Maiden" a strong favorite.

A HUSTLING POSTER MAN.

Tom Quill, representing the Goes Lithograph Company of Chicago, was in New York last week and paid The Film Index a visit. Mr. Quill is enthusiastic on the question of posters for picture plays and has succeeded in interestinig the Kleine, Essanay and Selig companies in his special brand of publicity. Quill says that his selling plan for posters is guaranteed to distribute more posters with better results than any other.

A CALL FORM THE SOUTHERN COLONEL.

Col. J. E. Pearce of the Imported Film Exchange of New Orleans, La., called at the office of The Film Index last week to renew acquaintance and pass us a few pleasantries. He was looking as dapper as ever and seemed pleased with the result of his visit to the big city.

NEW PICTURE MAGAZINE.

A new magazine project is under way, the scope and purpose of which is described in a circular recently sent to exhibitors, of which the following is an extract:

A well-known publishing house has offered to publish a monthly magazine, to be called the Moving Picture Story Magazine, containing short stories of all the leading makes of moving pictures that are being exhibited during the current month in licensed houses. This will be in no sense a trade magazine. No trade names will be mentioned, the magazine being purely one of entertainment and published for the public. The plots of our moving pictures will be rewritten by well-known magazine writers, and the book will contain each month about two dozen short stories. The illustrations will be of the highest and most artistic class, and it has been suggested, in addition to the fiction stories, to run each month a department devoted to personalities of well-known picture players. The price of the magazine will be 15 cents (10 cents to dealers), and it will be in shape and size similar to the Century, Munsey's, or any popular magazine. It will be sold in motion picture theatres to your patrons, and will also be on sale at all newsstands, railway stations, department stores, and other places where books can be obtained. You can readily appreciate the tremendous interest such a magazine will arouse and how greatly it will increase your patronage. Persons never having been in a moving picture theatre will read in the magazine, stories that greatly interest them, and the logical consequence will be that they will make it their business to find out where those stories can be seen in picture form and will go and see them."

D. D. Larue, a well known young photoplay manager in Indiana, has opened a first class photoplay theatre in Mongo. Besides running pictures, he is also having a well known local singer sing the latest illustrated songs.

Messrs. Vinson and Jacobs have opened a new and up-to-date house at Bryan, Texas.

The Empire theatre of Montgomery, Ala., has been closed for several days on account of the redecorating of the entire house, and extensive repairs are being made. The house will install many novelties in the motion picture houses.

AUCASSIN AND NICOLETE

Ancient French Ballade-Romantique Pictured by Edison Players

UNDER the title "In the Days of Chivalry" the Edison players have produced a picture version of the ancient song story of Aucassin and Nicolete, supposed to have been sung by the traveling minstrels of the Twelfth Century. It was of the time of castles, knights and men at arms, and "fair laydies" to be won and protected. It was an ambitious undertaking to attempt an adequate presentation of this quaint but touching love tale in a motion picture; but the result is most gratifying, giving as it does a connected picture story, sufficiently complete to be intelligible to those unfamiliar with the tale and, at the same time, satisfying to those who have read it.

Aucassin was the son of Count Garin de Biaucaire, who was at constant war with Count Bougars de Valence. Desperately in love with a slave girl named Nicolete, owned by the Captain of the town who had purchased her from the Saracens, Aucassin refused to have anything to do with war or anything save his "sweet lady." His father has the girl imprisoned. Then Aucassin makes a bargain with the old count that he will fight if he may see Nicolete, his sweet lady and "have of her two words or three and one kiss."

The Count consents and Aucassin goes into the fight from which he returns with his father's enemy, Count Bougars as a captive. When he demands his reward the father denies him and for his persistence throws him into a dungeon.

Nicolete tires of prison and effects an escape to the forest leaving word for Aucassin with trusted friends so that he may follow when chance offers. He has not long to wait, for when it became known to the Count, his father, that Nicolete has disappeared, Aucassin gets his freedom.

The Count gives a great fete for his son's entertainment, but word comes to Aucassin of the whereabouts of Nicolete and he hastens to find her, succeeding after a weary search through the forest where he discovers a bower of flowers which she has prepared.

From here the lovers journey to the sea and embark in a ship coming finally to the Kingdom of Torelore where they remained till captured by the Saracens when they were separated.

Aucassin managed to get back to his home. Nicolete was taken to the King of Carthage, who recognizes her as his long lost daughter, stolen when she was five years old. But when the King proposes her to wed to the King of Paynim, she disguises herself as a minstrel and makes her way back to Biaucaire, where she is recognized by Aucassin now Count, since his father and mother are dead, and the lovers are finally married.

Incidents of this story are portrayed in logical sequence and of sufficient frequency to make it understandable. The opening scene depicts the supposed discovery of the slave girl Nicolete by Aucassin and the beginning of his love. He next presents her to his father the Count in court and requests permission to marry her. The Count refuses and sends Nicolete to prison.

In a third scene the old Count is begging his son to go out and fight. At first Aucassin refuses; then he makes the bargain mentioned before.

The scene in which Aucassin goes forth to battle is a pretentious bit of stagecraft. To produce the desired effect of Castle walls, moat, sally-port and drawbridge, a considerable structure was built. The drawbridge was practical and drops into place across the moat as Aucassin and his knights and men-at-arms sally forth.

We are not permitted to see the fight which is off stage, but when Aucassin returns he brings his prisoner with him, and demands the father's promise. The old Count turns him down and sends him to jail.

These scenes with their armored knights and mailed men-at-arms is sufficiently mediaeval to satisfy the most exacting critic.

Next we are shown the escape of Nicolete and her visit to the dungeon of Aucassin, where, the story says they quarreled over the question of which loved the strongest; her concealment by the friendly sentry and her escape to the forest, passing the shepherd on the way.

Returning to Aucassin we see him brought into court and betrothed to a princess of high degree. He immediately escapes and follows Nicolete upon getting a whispered message from one of the retainers. He passes the shepherds to direct him and presently he comes upon Nicolete in her bower—a romantic scene.

The pictured version has the lovers embark on a ship which is attacked by pirates who carry Nicolete away and take her to the King of Carthage, who recognizes her as his daughter. The scene is followed by the attempt of the King to marry her out of hand to the King of Paynim and her escape as a minstrel.

The closing scene is the Court of Aucassin, now in his father's place at Biaucaire. A minstrel is brought in, who sits at the Count's feet. Soon he recognizes her as Nicolete and places her upon his throne amid general acclaim—a scene very prettily done.

EDISON CLASSIC PRODUCTION AUCASSIN AND NICOLETE.
Final Scene—Happy Recognition of Nicolete by Aucassin and Proclamation of Marriage.

A photoplay theatre is to be erected by the Progressive Investment Co., at Bloomfield avenue, Newark, N. J. The cost of the house will be $6,000. Another house will be built at the northeast corner of Arlington and Augusta streets, in the near future.

TWENTIETH CENTURY CLUB TALK PICTURES

Boston Organization Wants More Strict Censorship —Censor Casey Blames Lurid Posters

A good-sized gathering of men and women of Boston, Mass., discussed at the Twentieth Century Club on the afternoon of Nov. 30 the problem of the motion picture show. The general idea was that motion pictures are here to stay and that the thing to do is to work for a more rigid censorship with a view to eliminate films that are not up to the Twentieth Century Club's standard.

Mrs. Josephine Clement, manager of the Bijou theatre, presided, and said it was her constant aim to improve the tone of her programme. She said she thought that pictures not suitable for Sunday evening were not suitable for any other time.

John Casey, theatrical censor, and license clerk for the city, and Chief Whitney, of the State police, and censor for the Commonwealth, told of their troubles. Censor Casey said his principal difficulty was in preventing the picture house managers from exaggeration in their posters. He said some picture house managers advertise their shows with lurid lithographs showing murder, highway robbery and other crimes, although the show itself might be fairly mild.

Chief Whitney told how he punished managers who disobeyed his regulations regarding Sunday performances. He cited a case in which he decided to teach the manager a lesson. The fine for the violation in this case, he said, was $500, but the chief thought that was too easy, so he refused the manager a license one week. Thus it cost the manager $1,100. That is just what the chief said.

NEW BERN TO HAVE NEW THEATRE.

Lovick & Taylor, two enterprising photoplay managers of New Bern, N. C., are erecting a large, first-class photoplay theatre in that seaport city of 18,000 inhabitants. The house will seat 650 persons, 190 of which will find room in the gallery. The building will be heated by steam and thoroughly ventilated. The roof will be so constructed that it can be removed in summer, thus converting the house into a modern air dome.

It is the purpose of the managers of running high grade pictures and first-class vaudeville.

NEW LYRIC OPENED NOV. 23.

Messrs. Miedke and Woodyatt, of Davenport, Ct., opened their new motion picture house termed the Lyric Nov. 23. The new structure is quite an improvement to Sixth avenue, the total cost being about $5,000. The exterior is of stucco finish and of neat design. A spacious lobby has been arranged and the interior is completed with a view of comfort of patrons. The new proprietors promise a splendid line of pictures.

NEWARK HAS ANOTHER NEW HOUSE.

A new photoplay theatre, known as the "Broad Theatre," was opened on Broad street, Newark, N. J., on the night of Nov. 26. The house is one of the largest and most modern in the New Jersey metropolis and since its opening has been doing an excellent business. The interior of the house is most artistically decorated and all the seats are covered with red plush.

W. C. Stire, a well-known picture man, is the proprietor, and Charles Solader is the manager.

MELIES HAS NEW POSTER

An Elaborately Colored One-Sheet Affair, Part Pictorial and Part Descriptive.

Herewith is a reproduction of the new Melies poster, issued by them for each week's release, beginning with that of December 8, "What Great Bear Learned." As will be seen at a glance, the design differs from others now in use in that it combines both the descriptive and the pictorial elements. Heretofore posters have been either of the one nature or the other, and for that reason have never quite satisfied all exhibitors. Some want picture illustrations and others reading matter. In their new poster the Melies Company believes it has created something that will satisfy every one.

The cut gives no idea of the vivid coloring of the poster, and the effect this produces is lost in the photograph. The star trade mark, for instance, is a brilliant yellow, and stands out very prominently. Just enough reading matter is given to induce the passer-by to stop and read. Good-sized type is employed.

The new posters are obtainable, in New York City, at The Exhibitors' Advertising and Specialty Co., 105 East Fourteenth street. Outside New York, at any licensed film exchange.

EDITOR SMITH ENDORSED.

New York, Nov. 28, 1910.

Mr. Will C. Smith, care of Film Index, 1 Madison Avenue, New York City:

Dear Sir—At the last regular meeting of the Moving Picture Operators' Benevolent Association, I was ordered to send you a letter of thanks for your articles in The Film Index.

I can assure you that the boys are truly grateful and thank you from the bottom of their hearts.

Hoping that you may be always successful, I remain, WILLIAM F. McVEY, Secretary, Moving Picture Operators' Benevolent Ass'n.,
674 Manhattan Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Lyric theatre, Aurora, Neb., has been running full blast in its fine new quarters for the past ten days. Good pictures and vaudeville provide the entertainment.

The Victoria photoplay theatre, Macon, Ga., under the management of J. B. Melton, has been renamed the Victoria Palace. The Palace will soon be reopened after being entirely refitted and will continue under the able management of Mr. Melton.

THE DIME, IDAHO FALLS, IDAHO—Joseph George, Prop. and Mgr.

The Dime is the most popular theatre in Idaho Falls, the liveliest town in Southeastern Idaho, numbering about eight thousand souls. Its increasing business has demanded more room and a thirty-foot addition has just been completed. A fine type of opera chair has just been installed and the whole inside remodeled, and it would be hard to find a more artistic interior. Joe George, the owner and manager, is a live one—a booster and a good fellow, and he has brought the Dime up to its present status from a very humble beginning—from a seating capacity of 150 to more than 300. Besides the comfort of his patrons, Mr. George gives particular attention to his operating room and the music. Licensed pictures have always been used, and these are shown at their best. He uses piano and trap drums with an occasional violin or cornet. Where the occasion warrants he employs some local speaker to lecture the picture.

PRAISES TIMES INVESTIGATION

W. P. Herbst, Well Known Picture Man, Says Times Articles Are Unbiased Opinions and Deserve Praise.

W. P. Herbst, president of the Circle Amusement Company, in his article to the Washington Times, of Washington, D. C., praises that well known publication for the manner in which it conducted its investigation, pertaining to the photoplay theatres in Washington. Mr. Herbst sends the following article to the Times telling how dark houses can be eliminated:

By W. P. Herbst.

The writers of the articles appearing recently in The Times on the subject of the motion picture house, its effect on the health and morals of a community, are to be congratulated that they gave their views in an unbiased manner, without recklessly or maliciously condemning this amusement institution.

Naturally they brought out the worst features of the average motion picture theatre, and when these have been analyzed and appreciated by the public, it should result in much good and the uplifting of the motion picture to a higher plane than it occupies at present.

Two years ago the Motion Picture Patents Company was formed and anyone who has followed the development of the motion picture business since, must realize the great improvement that has taken place in the moral tone of the pictures exhibited. It was through the agency of this company that the national board of censors came into existence, and through the board that the pictures have reached their present high standard.

The motion picture has become the standard amusement of a class of people who are the backbone of the nation. Nothing in the history of the world has done so much for the pleasure of children, at the same time affording them instruction. It is conceded that the motion picture is a necessary adjunct to all educational institutions, and persons interested in the welfare of their fellowman have found it a wonderful agency for enlightening those who, through ignorance, could not have been instructed any other way.

Those who are working to get rid of the objectionable features in the photoplay house should see that cheap vaudeville is banished. One of your contributors has well said:

"I would rather risk my child in the motion picture show than have him habitually see and hear many numbers on the vaudeville stage."

If one would see vaudeville let him go where only the best vaudeville is shown. Good pictures can be shown for 5 cents, but not good vaudeville.

If parents would insist on their children being at home at an early hour this would not only relieve the management of the motion picture house, when it is crowded, but would be much better for the child. If they are allowed to stay out, however, they are better off in the theatre, where they are required to be orderly.

The child not only should be protected by censorship of motion picture films, but by a censorship of advertising, post cards, etc., as well. Only a few days ago I saw an advertising card by a local house, and if such a picture were shown on a screen, the people would have just cause to make complaint.

I am for good, wholesome pictures, no matter when or where shown.

In addition to the necessity of moral pictures, the lighting of a photoplay house is of vital importance. At no time should the auditorium be so dark that one could not easily see a seat without having to feel one's way. The Circle Theatre, by use of a mirror screen, demonstrates that a photoplay house can be well lighted at all times, besides producing a strong picture.

The electrical work, ventilating system and fire protection of all of Washington's motion picture theatres are well looked after by the district government, and there is no doubt they are the best governed theatres of their kind to be found anywhere in the country.

NEW MANAGER AT SCENIC PHOTOPLAY.

The Scenic Motion Picture house on South —Main street, Fall River, Mass., has been under new management for the past week and already evidence has been shown that this new management means a decided change for the better for this popular amusement place. The new manager is Harry Archer, formerly connected with the Palace theatre on the corner of Bedford and Third streets. Mr. Archer is well known in the city and has many friends here. For the past week he has been giving his patrons an excellent program of high class motion pictures, a good policy well begun and one which promises continuance. Mr. Archer has many plans for the improvement of the house which he will immediately execute.

The interior of the Electric Theatre, Manteno, Ill., has been treated to a new coat of paint. Manager Bonneau expects to make more improvements in the near future.

ADVERTISING THE PICTURE THEATRE

By DORE HOFFMAN

NOTE—This department suggested itself to the editor of The Film Index because of the many communications received by him containing novel forms of advertisements upon which his opinion was solicited. These forms are at hand and will be commented upon in this department. It is the earnest desire of the publishers that all readers of The Film Index who have ideas on this subject send them in. Such communications will be acknowledged and used when practicable. Let the world know what you are doing.

ADVERTISING is a subject with so many different phases that I will not attempt to crowd too many different methods in one talk, but shall each week touch upon a line of advertising, properly adapted to certain kinds of shows. It is my belief that entirely different methods should be used in advertising the city theatre from those used in the country theatre. Even in the metropolis itself there are sections where the character of the population differs so greatly that entirely different methods must be employed.

Before touching upon posters, handbills, descriptions and the like, I shall first speak of the theatre proper. Nothing advertises the theatre more than the theatre itself. A theatre to gain patronage must in some way appeal to the people. If you were to solicit a position, you would put on your best suit, your cleanest linen and your best manners. That is salesmanship. You make yourself attractive—you do everything to attract and impress your prospective employer. Running a picture show is salesmanship. You have a performance to sell and to make your commission you must sell it to a full house, but what you sell in this house must attract and impress your customers just as much as if you were selling yourself or a safety razor, or an automobile.

Therefore, the first step you must take in the advertising field is to have an attractive theatre. Your house must be a by-word for cleanliness and comfort, and if not a gorgeous, you must have at least a neat front to your theatre, because, as the personal habits of a man are judged by the way he dresses, so is the character of a show judged by the dress of its front. F. T. Montgomery, the well-known motion picture man of the south, uses excellent taste in the decoration of his lobby. The accompanying illustrations will give an idea of the Grand Theatre, Jacksonville, Fla., before and after a simple scheme of decoration was added. Not satisfied with a lobby such as other exhibitors could have, he must needs inaugurate floral decoration. In other words, he is a leader; his show is a leader; and for that reason is talked about. Money is well spent that obtains such results.

But do not stop at the front. To have a model front and a poor interior is to deceive your patrons, who would naturally say "Well, this man's a bluff, he paints up the outside of his house, but allows the inside to remain old and dirty. I'm sorry we came." Have the interior of your house in every respect as neat and as attractive as the outside. Be known as one who does things thoroughly, and not as one who stops half way.

As I said before, to sell your show, you must attract the people, and after attracting them you must impress them. This is where the performance itself comes in. Of what use is a handsome house if a poor show is to be given? The handsome house attracts, but it is the show that impresses. Use the same care and judgment in selecting a show that you would if selecting a suitable design or fittings for your theatre. Be known as the man who runs a clean show. Procure a varied program of good pictures. Vaudeville is optional, but my advice is, if you cannot run the best of vaudeville, do not run any. You can advertise until Doom's-day, with circulars and posters, but if you have a show that causes people to complain and speak ill of it to their friends, you lose out in the end. Better to have them pleased, and praise your show. That is free advertising, and after all the best kind of advertising.

Courtesy does a great deal to please patrons. Select for your employees, only those who have a genial appearance and who know how to be polite. A "How-do-you-do" to steady patrons starts the evening right and makes them think you take a personal interest in them and know that they are patronizing you.

Lighting is a very important advertising feature. Both the inside and outside of an auditorium should be well lighted. Some exhibitors have told me that they considered the flaming arc lamp cheap. Not so. It is used by the best theatres of the land with great success. It throws for many blocks the message that something is going on in the vicinity of the flame. It is a leader, a guider, and an attractor. That the inside of a theatre is light is indicative of that thoughtful attention that patrons like to believe is given them. Inside lighting during the exhibition of pictures is no longer an impossible feat. In fact, the authorities of New York City require that all picture theatres be well lighted during projection. A wise exhibitor, however, will not wait until he is forced to make this improvement. He will make the change of his own accord and by so doing, guard against this talk of dark houses being dens of iniquity, etc.

To sum up, then: A picture theatre is its own best advertisement. The three principal points of an advertisement are, first, to attract; second, to interest enough to gain attention; third, to convince the prospective customer that he should buy or become a patron, as the case may be. Your lobby should attract, the countesy of your doormen and the interior of your house should interest, and the character of the show should convince the patron that he wants to come again.

TOKYO PHOTOPLAY THEATRE OPENS.

The new Tokyo photoplay theatre, Logansport, Ind., opened on Nov. 28th to a crowded house. The house is situated at 308 Market street, and is owned by Rife & Dehaven. The Tokyo is beautifully decorated, the woodwork is done in mission. The front of the house is also done in mission and is illuminated with large frosted globes. The managers are running the latest reels at every performance.

By James S McQuade

WM. H. BELL, manager of the Spoor branch of the General Film Co., at 435 N. Clark street, states that business is very satisfactory and that a gradual and substantial increase is being shown. Exhibitors express themselves as being very well pleased with the service now furnished, and they refer with special satisfaction to the elimination of the booking of the same film subject, on the same date, to competing houses. Manager Bell tells me that his increased business is due chiefly to exhibitors who have forsaken the "independent" ranks and to vaudeville managers, who are either changing their entertainment to pictures, or who are installing pictures to strengthen their vaudeville.

Mr. Bell had something interesting to say of the difference in exhibition conditions in the Eastern states and in the Pacific Northwest. As will be remembered, Mr. Bell came from Spokane, Wash., to take the management of the George K. Spoor Co., several months before that exchange was purchased by the General Film Co., and that he was engaged there for several years in the management of licensed exchanges and in conducting a general supply house for picture, vaudeville and legitimate theatres.

Here is a statement of Mr. Bell's views:

"The Eastern established practice of presenting a daily change of three reels, or a total of 21 reels weekly, is sufficient to shock the Coast moving picture man, without mentioning the fact that strenuous efforts have been made to put on a four-reel exhibition, showing 28 reels weekly. A jolt hardly less severe is to learn of the prevailing custom of using a mixed quality service, something on this order: 1st reel, first run, 2d, 10 day; 3d, commercial run. This condition has no doubt been brought about by competition upon the part of film exchanges and exhibitors.

"The first straight picture theatre in the extreme Northwest was opened in Spokane, Wash., four years ago by me. The Kinodrome was used and the film releases being irregular, we were very fortunate to get a service of two reels, twice weekly. There are established to-day in the immediate Spokane country—known as the Inland Empire, over 150 motion picture theatres, all in flourishing condition with a few exceptions.

"The service used almost universally, is 6 reels weekly in two changes, on Sundays and Wednesdays. Continuous shows run from 11 a. m. to 11 p. m., about one hour each performance. The general admission is 10 cents, except in smaller towns, where 15 to 25 cents admission is charged.

"The exhibitions are high class in every way and the musical end is given considerable attention. Good picture piano players are known to receive a salary of $50 per week. Vaudeville acts are very rarely drawn upon, the managers being very energetic in their efforts to present the best possible moving picture entertainments. Store shows are almost unknown, and photoplay houses are especially built for the purpose, representing individual investments up to $3,500.

"The operators have developed themselves to a high degree of efficiency, and the situation is a peculiar one in Spokane on account of the Union having been practically formed and supported by the Managers Association. An operator's salary is $25 per week, six hours constituting a day's work. Operating booths are large, roomy and well kept. Two moving picture machines are constantly maintained in each of the leading picture theatres, and in theatres giving moving pictures exclusively the machines work alternately, projecting pictures for 12 hours without intermissions of any kind.

"Butte, Mont., is a particularly good picture show town, while the business in Spokane, Seattle and Portland is highly satisfactory. The condition of moving picture affairs in Chicago and the central states is improving daily. This is apparent to all. Investors are becoming more confident and that substantial stage which is so desirable is close upon us. The business gives every indication of being on the general uplift and those in touch with the different branches of it, hold a decidedly optimistic view of the future."

New City Office for Essanay Officials.

The Essanay Film Manufacturing Co. will move into the new city office, suite 521 First National Bank Building, on December 15. This office will be the official headquarters of the president, George K. Spoor; the vice-president, G. M. Anderson; the secretary, Miss A. C. Hoffman, and the office manager, V. R. Day. All other departments of the Essanay Co., formerly located at 435 N. Clark street, will be transferred to the offices in the new building at the plant, 1333 Argyle street, on the date mentioned.

Comedy and Scenic Film for Insane.

I have just learned from L. Hough, demonstrator of the type B. Edison machine, that the Ohio State Hospital, at Massillon, O., has installed a film service of scenic and comedy subjects for the entertainment of patients suffering from nervous diseases and melancholia.

Dr. Eyman, the superintendent, who is responsible for the innovation, has discovered by careful observation that patients who are suffering from mild insanity, of the types mentioned, are visibly affected for the better by comedy and scenic exhibitions. They talk of the pictures and of the people appearing in them much the same as sane people do of a drama or an opera and of the actors and singers sustaining the various roles. The aroused mentality thus affected grows stronger with each entertainment, and in the course of time thought and speech become coherent.

The institution has a large auditorium that will seat 1,000 people. It is provided with a stage and scenery and the interior is attractive and comfortable. Three shows are given weekly, in the afternoon, and they are eagerly looked forward to by the inmates. Pictures have now been presented for a year and great good has been accomplished.

Henry C. Frick, the steel magnate of Pittsburg, has just donated a new machine, an Edison type B. being selected. The film service is furnished by the General Film Co., of Cleveland.

Missed Train to See Picture.

"Two Boys in Blue," a Selig release of some time ago, has lost none of its drawing power, judging from a letter and newspaper clipping received by the Selig Polyscope Co. from W. A. Finney, manager of the Grand Opera House, Brunswick, Ga., the other day. Following is the excerpt from the Brunswick News:

"Three country visitors, who had been in the city on their Saturday shopping trip, were so impressed with a wild west picture at the Grand yesterday afternoon that they let their train depart without them, and consequently had to spend the night in the city, but they saw something which appealed strongly to them and if their life had depended on it they probably would have seen the finish of the picture.

"Walking into the Grand shortly after 3 o'clock the visitors notified Manager Finney that they were compelled to leave on the 4 o'clock Coast Line train and requested him to step inside and call them a few minutes before train time. This the manager did. The visitors came as far as the front entrance and a big argument between them started. 'Let the train go, I've got to see the finish of the battle,' said one of them, so all thre walked back into the opera house and remained the balance of the afternoon, seeing all of the wild west pictures repeated two or three times."

Offensive Songs Barred.

The police censorship of offensive songs is not only being rigorously enforced but managers of vaudeville houses are taking an active part in their suppression.

The other day Manager Ballaban of the Circle Theatre, this city, forbade a singer to sing "Yiddish Love" on his stage, because it offended a large class of his regular patrons. Other managers have long complained that their business is injured by performers who use songs and talk that wound the sensibilities of patrons through ridicule of race or creed. One new South Side theatre was seriously set back by the headliner of its inaugural show, who in his monologue, so seriously affronted the Hebrews, who form the backbone of the surrounding district, that a ban was declared and the house has not had a profitable week since.

"Stop, Stop, Stop," a song that was sung by a young woman at the National Apple Show, in the First Regiment Armory, was stopped by the police, who even refused to allow the band to play the music.

Following the police order, an attorney for the publishers of the song filed a petition before Judge Chetlain in the Superior Court asking for an injunction to restrain the police from stopping songs banned by the censor.

Mayor Busse and Chief of Police Steward were notified to be present and show cause why the song should not be sung in the city of Chicago.

The song in question is one of those recently put under the ban by Chief Steward, and which he declared was offensive, not because of its words, but by reason of the gestures and movements made during its rendition. The publishers' attorney has stated that, if this is the real reason for the song being banned, if the Court will allow it, he will have the singer appear and sing the song, just as she did at the Apple Show.

The New Archer Theatre Opened.

Chas. R. Svinning, who formerly operated the McKinley Park family theatre, on 35th street and Archer avenue, has taken over the new Archer theatre on 35th street, near Archer avenue.

The new Archer theatre is a beautiful structure, erected by the Archer Amusement Co., at a cost of $50,000. It was built specially for the exhibition of licensed pictures and will be run as a first-class moving picture theatre. A high quality service has been arranged for with the American branch of the General Film Co. at 77 S. Clark street.

The new Archer has 1,000 seats, everyone of which is a reserved seat, as from any one of them an unobstructed view of the curtain is given. This is due to the fine pitch of the auditorium, those in the rear seats being able to see the pictures, even if the ladies are wearing the enormous headgears now in vogue.

The interior decorations and appointments are thoroughly modern and tasteful, and the attractive front is of glazed brick and enameled tile.

Manager Svinning took hold of the Archer Monday, Dec. 5, and opened to a record breaking business for that locality. He is the pioneer in that neighborhood of moving pictures, and has made the exhibition business his special study. He is a thorough believer in good instrumental music, as an adjunct to a picture show, and has a well selected orchestra of four pieces. He makes it a special point to play the pictures and makes careful selections of appropriate music for each film subject.

An Autoing Picture Party.

Will Avery, of Kewanee, Ill., recently asserted in the presence of Chris Taylor, owner of the Dreamland theatre in Kewanee, and of I. Van Ronkel, of the American branch of the General Film Co., this city, that he could take himself and party by automobile to Amarillo, Tex., and that, being furnished with the necessary outfit for giving a moving picture show, he and his party would defray all expenses from the proceeds of the exhibitions given during the trip and that no other funds would be used.

Messrs. Taylor and Van Ronkel then made a wager of $1,000 that Avery could not perform his part of the contract and papers were drawn up binding the interested parties. If Mr. Avery succeeds, he will be the richer by $1,000 and Messrs. Van Ronkel and Taylor that much poorer between them.

The big touring car, the Dreamland, left about a week ago with Avery at the wheel. Mrs. Chris Taylor went along with the party to see that the contract is fulfilled to the letter and to look after the finances. An expert piano player and singer was included among the tourists.

Before starting the car was allowed two extra tires and a supply of gasoline and oil. It was the intention to visit as many towns as possible

"BY THE KING'S ORDER"

A Romantic Drama by Urban-Eclipse

By JAMES S. McQUADE

A ROMANTIC story of medieval days, laid in France, is the subject of an Urban-Eclipse film viewed by me in the Kleine exhibition room last week. Of full reel length, the film has not a dull moment. There is action, action and still more action. One can easily follow the thread of the story after the opening scenes, and the interest gradually increases as it proceeds to the finale. The pretty little love tale interwoven with the main plot serves to soften the harshness of the encounters at arms common to those days of blood and rapine.

is pleasing and enables one to catch clearly the expressions on the faces of the actors, a something that to me is absolutely requisite in motion pictures of a dramatic nature.

The opening scene shows the elder Villon lying in wait, with his band of retainers, to waylay travelers on the highway that passes by his fortress on the hill. The three wayfarers are seized and robbed of their belongings and, while in despair over their losses, they espy the Marquis of St. Leu approaching them on horseback. To him they relate their wrongs and he promises the young man and, recognizing Jasper, treats him with marked coldness. He orders his daughter to the house and bids Jasper be off. The latter, full of pride and resentment, turns his back on father and daughter and walks rapidly away.

Following this scene, in close succession, is another showing the arrival at St. Leu castle of a squad of soldiers in charge of an officer. The latter presents a letter to the Marquis, who discovers at the first glance that it is a dispatch from the King of France. It commands him, in the King's name, to seize, dead or alive, Jean Villon on charge of rebellion against the royal authority. Almost despairing that he is ordered to command an armed party against his own brother, the Marquis recovers himself and leads the soldiers to the attack.

Lucy has heard her father read the King's letter and fearing for the safety of Jasper, whom she has loved from first sight, she rushes off to warn him of his danger. In the meantime Jasper has returned home. Jean Villon with his

VICTIMS OF ROBBERS REPORT TO MARQUIS.

JASPER VILLON GIVES AID TO LUCY OF ST. LEU.

The four principal roles are sustained by those clever and finished actors, Messrs. Habay, Etievant and Gay, and Mlle. Celiat, the two former of the Ambigu theatre, and the two last named from the Odeon, Paris. I watched this mimic acting very closely, and I am of the opinion that the keenest criticism must end in warm praise.

The old robber noble, Jean Villon, affords a splendid bit of character acting, and the make-up and costume are most fitting for the character. The Marquis of St. Leu is another fine portrayal. The contrast between these two men of the same noble blood—the one an oppressor of the poor and weak, and the other their champion and defender, proud of his lineage and redress and a remonstrance with his brother, the elder Villon.

The next scene shows the arrival of the Marquis at the home of his brother and the angry conversation between them. Jasper, the son of Jean Villon, is much moved by the denunciation of the latter's crimes by the Marquis, and engages in a heated dispute with his father after the Marquis has departed. He leaves his home in high dudgeon and we catch sight of him as he passes through the woods and underbrush. He is surprised to discover a riderless horse, saddled and bridled, and on looking around, espies a young girl lying prostrate close by. He rushes to her aid and, restoring her to consciousness, servants and followers are assembled in the old tower. A look-out tells him of the approach of the soldiers and we see the grim old man hastily arm his retainers and order them to the loopholes of the tower. Spying Jasper, who shows no disposition to join in the fray, he thrusts a musket into his hands and rushes up the winding stairs to command the defense. But Jasper hesitates to follow, and during these moments he hears a knock on the outer door. Throwing it open he finds that it is Lucy. The girl, fighting against maidenly modesty and anxiety over her lover's fate, soon convinces him that he must flee. It is now too late to depart by any of the doors, for the castle is surrounded by the jealous of his honor—is finely drawn. The Marquis shows nobility in gesture and mien as well as in countenance. Miss Celiat is charming as Lucy.

Much care is evident in the environment given the story. The interior of the old tower, in the castle of the elder Villon, and the approach to the castle of the Marquis of St. Leu are fine specimens of what might have been the architecture of the time. The photography throughout finds that she has been thrown by her mount. Then he assists her to walk towards home. Unknown to Jasper, the young lady is none other than Lucy, only daughter of the Marquis of St. Leu and his own first cousin.

As they approach the St. Leu castle, we see the Marquis meet them. He shows deep concern over his daughter's condition. She explains, and dwells on the timely service of the stranger who rescued her. The Marquis turns to thank soldiers. Remembering the story of a secret passage, Jasper presses a spring in the masonry of the stairway and an exit is immediately revealed. Through this the lovers disappear and the entrance to the passageway closes.

But they are doomed to an ordeal. Just as they emerge from a doorway in the ground floor of the structure, they run into the arms of the Marquis of St. Leu. Lucy begs her father to permit Jasper to escape and he listens to her appeals. She is sent home accompanied by a servant, while Jasper is allowed to escape in another direction.

The Villon fortress is finally entered, and we see the soldiers rush into the room in the old tower, on the floor of which the bodies of the dead defenders lie strewn. But that of Jean Villon is not among them. He has taken refuge in the tunnel underneath, by means of the secret passage.

We next see Jasper and Lucy in happy conference at her home. The Marquis appears on the scene, unknown to the lovers, and we can see that he is happy over the choice made by his daughter. At this juncture a Mr. Minion is ushered in. He is a favorite of the King and carries a pardon for Jasper. The latter is jealous because Mr. Minion is an aspirant for Lucy's hand, and when the parchment is handed him he tears it up, throwing it at Minion's feet, and meanwhile announcing his refusal of the pardon. Then he rushes away to the old tower.

Lucy induces her father and Mr. Minion to accompany her to the Villon home, in order to save her lover from any rash act. As they approach, the elder Villon is seen to discharge a pistol. The bullet is intended for the Marquis, but it inflicts a glancing wound on Lucy's shoulder.

When Villon fires his last shot he again seeks refuge through the secret opening. On that instant Jasper enters the tower, ignorant of the shot and its consequences. He lifts the pistol from the floor, and is examining it when the Marquis and Minion, who are supporting Lucy, rush on him and disarm him.

It is the thought of both men that Jasper is the guilty one, but the latter angrily asserts his innocence and is overcome by the condition of his sweetheart. Suddenly he espies his father's hat lying near the secret exit. He lifts it and pointing to it tells them of his fears. Then mad with the horror of the attempted crime, he reveals the secret passage. A few moments afterwards the aged criminal is taken into custody and marched away. The lovers are reunited and the Marquis gives his sanction to their marriage.

CHARITY INSTITUTE GET PICTURE MACHINE

Rev. Dr. J. Roy Postlewait, Kansas City, Plans Big Campaign, Pictures for All.

Now that a motion picture machine has been installed in the auditorium of the twenty-ninth Street Institute, Kansas City, Mo., the Rev. J. Roy Postlewait is planning a winter campaign for the betterment of that isolated part of the town. Dr. Postlewait, since taking charge of the Twenty-ninth street mission, has long seen the need of giving motion picture entertainments in the institute. The institute is situated in a part of the city where there are practically no amusements whatever, and the saloons and pool rooms are reaping a harvest of about $800 daily from the lack of proper entertainment.

While it is the purpose of Dr. Postlewait of giving pictures pertaining to religious subjects and for the purpose of instructing children in the Sunday School lessons; he also believes in giving something that is educational and humorous. It is not his purpose to make the entertainments at the institute of a strictly religious nature, but on certain week nights to give a regular photoplay show, where all can come and enjoy themselves.

In a letter to The Film Index Dr. Postlewait states the following:

A motion picture machine has been purchased and installed in the institute for the purpose of presenting lessons to the children in an attractive and impressive manner; it is expected that this will increase the attendance in the Sunday school about two hundred and will add to the interest of every department of the church. Everybody in the Sunday school, both large and small, will receive an admission card to the entertainment Friday evening.

Those who do not go to Sunday school will have to pay an admission fee of five cents. This arrangement was made, not as "a leap in the dark" or an experiment, but for the good and sufficient reason that many mothers will not "take the trouble to get their children ready for Sunday school," and this makes it necessary for us to cause some disturbance in the family by throwing out the extra inducement to the children that will make them help themselves and insist on mother doing her part. The scheme works. It has the advantage of giving us two hours a week with four hundred children, instead of one hour a week with two hundred children, and by the aid of the pictures we are able to make impressions on their minds that will be of lasting value. The children talking to their parents and others about what is going on at the church attracts their attention in that direction and increases the attendance at every service.

I believe every church should have a motion picture machine and use it every week for explaining the lessons for the following Sunday in addition to the necessity for its use as a means of entertainment for the younger folks, who must be reached and held by extraordinary methods. J. ROY POSTLEWAIT.

REV. J. ROY POSTLEWAIT.

As a settlement worker, Dr. Postlewait needs no introduction to the people in the Central West; at any meeting of philanthropic workers, he in no way hesitates to tell what is needed, and furthermore, he is a man who gets what he goes after. Only at a recent meeting of the philanthropic workers of Kansas City he made the following plea for motion pictures:

Give me enough money to purchase and the use of instructive and amusing films, and I eventually will make more good law-abiding citizens out of the children of the poorer districts than by months of preaching.

Since that time he has received the machine and is now planning for his winter's work. He expects to give the best class of pictures obtainable, and with them, try and uplift the social and moral conditions of that industrial community. All will be treated alike, and all religious denominations will be welcome to these entertainments.

NEW HOUSE FOR PUEBLO.

Pueblo, Colo., is to have a new picture theatre which, it is said, will rival in magnificence of furnishings and quality of pictures shown, any picture show in the West. The promoters of the new show are B. D. V. Reeve, Pueblo attorney, O. T. Curtis, proprietor of a photoplay theatre in Bessemer, and H. L. Lent, who is connected with the Dreamland theatre in Pueblo and the Princess theatre in Denver.

The promoters filed articles of incorporation in Denver recently for the Photo-Play Theatre Company. The capital stock is $25,000, and this sum will be spent in fitting up the new theatre, which is to be located in the heart of the business section of Pueblo.

Attorney B. D. V. Reeve stated that for business reasons the location would not be made public for a few days, but that the new theatre would be open and ready for business within a short time. It is to be elaborately furnished.

John Thompson opened a photoplay and vaudeville show in Pierce's Opera House, Ironwood, Minn.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyr ight by J. H. Hallberg. All Rights Reserved.

"SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 16."—The three-wire service within a building requires careful balancing of the load giving an equal number of amperes on either side of the three-wire system.

When M. P., Stereo, or spot lights are operated on a three-wire system it is better to connect such lamps on the outside or 220-volt wires.

"ELECTRICAL TALK" No. 16

The Recording Watt Meter.

When electricity was first offered for sale, the electric lighting company generally made a contract with the consumer to supply him with current to operate a given number of lamps, motors or other devices. This flat rate allowed the consumer to use the lamps or devices as long as the current was maintained at his service. You will agree that such an arrangement or contract is unjust to all concerned, and after a few years the electric lighting company found that it was absolutely necessary to secure some means for measuring just the amount of current required by each consumer and charge him therefor in accordance with the reading of the instrument or meter.

A consumer, in the early days, may have had one hundred 16-candle power lamps in his store divided on two or three floors. According to the old system he would be obliged to pay, we will say, for argument sake, $1.00 for each connected 16 c. p. lamp per month. This would make his monthly bill $100, no matter how long or how many of the lamps installed were burning.

The first step taken by the electric lighting companies was to secure means for determining just how many of the lamps installed were burning a given number of hours, and those figures were obtained by watching the installation, in some instances secretly, to see just how many lamps were burning on the average. An ordinary indicating ampere meter was connected on the premises of the consumer and an expert was stationed there to take readings, many times a day and night, thus establishing an average figure for the consumption. Should the consumer add a few lamps or a fan motor to his installation or burn his lamps longer than usual or than contracted for, the electric lighting company would be the loser. On the other hand, should the consumer, as is the case during the light months of the year, burn his lamps a lesser number of hours, he would be the loser.

These difficulties forced the electric lighting companies to demand from the electric manufacturers some form of electric meter, and as a result the Recording Ampere Meter was offered for sale and installed in many instances, by the electric companies.

The Recording Ampere Meter served its purpose 20 years or so ago, inasmuch as it registered on a number of dials the number of ampere hours used by the consumer and who was charged in accordance therewith. As long as the voltage on the electric company's system was maintained constant, and the load consisted of incandescent lamps or other non-inductive load only, the Recording Ampere Meter gave good satisfaction.

Not many years after the introduction of the Recording Ampere Meter, the manufacturers developed what is now known as the Recording Watt Meter.

The Recording Watt Meter gives the instantaneous value of the watts expended in the circuit, and is, as its name indicates, a Recording Watt Meter, and its reading gives the product of the watts and time, i. e., the watt hours. The construction is simple. the principle is, broadly, that of the Siemens Dynamo-Meter, which is composed of a stationary coil of copper wire in series with the load and surrounding this coil there is suspended another at right angles to the first coil and this outside coil is connected in shunt with the load, as illustrated in Figure 34. In the Recording Watt Meter, however, the movable coil is not held to zero position, but revolves between two fixed coils. The movable coil is really a small drum-wound armature provided with a small commutator made of silver to prevent oxidation. The effect of using the commutator is to make the effective plain of the moving coil (armature) take a position at right angle to the plain of the fixed coils.

The connections of the Recording Watt Meter are made on the same principle as those of the Indicating Watt Meter illustrated in Figure 34. The fixed coils are in series with the circuit and the movable coil and a small resistance in series with it are in parallel with the circuit as illustrated in Figure 35.

The amount of energy expended in the circuit is measured by the rotation of the movable coil or armature, which rotates and drives a worm on the upper end of the armature shaft engaging with a set of gears which operate a dial similar to a gas meter dial so that the energy expended in a given time in a circuit may be read directly from the dial in Watt-Hours.

The friction of the apparatus being exceedingly small the retarding force on the coil that opposes its tendency to rotate is imparted by a thin copper disk attached to the lower end of the shaft at which the armature is mounted. This disk is rotated between the poles of strong permanent magnets; the lines of force from the magnets cutting the disk, set up electric motive forces between adjacent points on the disk; the disk being of copper, the resistance between those points is very low, so that a considerable local current may flow in the copper disk. This current tends to retard the rotation of the copper disk, and this tendency increases directly as the speed. The force acting to rotate the armature increases directly as the watts, therefore, the number of revolutions of the moving system of the meter will be directly proportional to the watts extending in the circuit. This type of meter may be used for either alternating or direct currents, and gives very accurate results.

SUMMARY:

The Indicating Watt Meter is an instrument which, while applied to a circuit will indicate or show while it is under observation, the number of watts expended at a given instant in an electric circuit.

The Recording Watt Meter is an instrument which records the number of watt-hours expended in an electric circuit by moving the hands on a set of dials the same as on a gas meter.

In our next talk we will further discuss the Recording Watt Meter.

"A TANGLED MASQUERADE"

Essanay Comedy Photoplay of Unusual Excellence

"A TANGLED MASQUERADE," Essanay's release of December 13th, is a photoplay, unique and interesting in story and adequately acted by the new Essanay Stock Company.

The story is one that will appeal to the humorous sensibilities of any audience, the scenes follow one another without a drag, each being a distinct scream in itself.

The photography is splendid, bringing out the beauties of this richly set and costumed photocomedy.

SCENE FROM ESSANAY SUBJECT "A TANGLED MASQUERADE."

The story deals with the love affairs of Ralph Ford and his rival, Paul Dunlap, a hypocritical young man who has managed to pull the wool over the eyes of the girl's father, although he is less successful with the girl herself.

Father is insistent that Helen marry his favorite, Paul, and Ralph is driven to the extremity of suggesting an elopement. Helen, falling in with the plan, elaborates the details of the escapade, and arranges to meet Ralph at a coming masquerade ball, telling him what costume she will wear.

Paul, true to his character, does not scruple to open Helen's answer to Ralph when the letter falls into his hands, and he resolves to attend the ball himself, keeping his rival in ignorance of the girl's acquiescence. However, Father's well meant machinations in favor of Paul work to that young man's undoing.

The wily old gentleman, having seen Helen write the note, pretends to her that he intends to permit her attendance at the ball, and on the evening of the appointment he suddenly springs his surprise by confiscating the costume and announcing his intention of wearing it himself.

He leaves the house with this idea in mind, and Helen, hoping to intercept Ralph at his rooms, telephones to him and learns that he has received no note from her, and that Paul has gone to the masquerade. She informs Ralph of her Father's intentions and they decide to avail themselves of the old gentleman's absence and elope.

Father attends the masquerade, Paul mistakes him for Helen. Father readily mistakes Paul for Ralph. This delightfully humorous scene takes place in the ballroom, thronged with beautifully costumed guests, and is a scene which in scope, depth and setting will commend itself to any picture lover. The camera has slighted no detail, and the photography in this as well as the other scenes is splendid.

Father and Paul, each ignorant of the other's identity, seek a minister, Paul believing himself about to marry the girl of his heart and Father anticipating with glee the discomfiture of his daughter's unwelcome suitor.

Arrived at the minister's, they learn that another couple is ahead of them, and upon entering the parlor where the ceremony is in progress, they are astounded to find Ralph and Helen already united in bonds of matrimony.

Paul's duplicity in opening his rival's letter, or perhaps the ridiculous situation in which his action placed Father, gains him the hearty contempt of the old man, and Mr. Moore is easily induced to make the best of matters and give his blessing to the newly married couple, which he does as gracefully as he can, bringing the story to a finish that is satisfactory to all.

Charles S. Higginbotham, who owns the Grand Theatre, Holyoke, Mass., has purchased the Globe Theatre of the same city, formerly conducted by John H. Woods and T. W. Cavanaugh.

The Liberty Theatre is a new picture house now under construction on State, between First South and Second South streets, Salt Lake City, Utah. It will have a seating capacity of 1,000.

ESSANAY POLICE PICTURE.

Stirs Up Big Row in Chicago—Newspapers Give It Wide Publicity

The Chicago Daily Journal of Dec. 2, prints a three-column article charging graft in the Chicago police department when over seven hundred policemen were drilled before the moving picture cameras of the Essanay Film Mfg. Co. It is further alleged that the policemen were drilled for two weeks for this event and that during that time crime was rampant in Chicago; and that the police, who were employed in the making of the film, had been permitted to sleep during the reign of robbery and murder.

The above paragraph is explained in part of the article in the Journal in an interview with Chief of Police Steward of Chicago, when he said: "I do not think it is any body's business why these pictures were taken," when asked his purpose in having them made. "I alone am responsible for them. No one else had anything to do with it.

"I took up the matter with the Association of Commerce, and they thought it would be a nice thing to do; so I ordered some infantry, some cavalry, and the motor-cycle men over to the Lake Front, the picture people having agreed to make the film for nothing.

"There was no collateral consideration of any kind whatever in this deal.

"We will have some more taken of traffic conditions, so Capt. Healy can use them in a lecture."

Beginning two weeks prior to the picturizing of the Chicago police, a wave of crime had swept over the city in which eight persons were murdered, women beaten by negro highwaymen, citizens held up with impunity at all hours of the night, safes blown and houses robbed, and all this was charged to Chief Steward for allowing his men to be off duty during the four or five hours of picture making.

In explaining this Chief Steward said: "I do not think the absence of the men had anything to do with the crime wave. It was just an outbreak such as usually comes at this season of the year."

The outcome of the matter in which the Chicago Daily Journal alleges that the Chicago police officials profited in the making of a film for the Essanay Film Mfg. Co., is that, notwithstanding the fact that nothing was paid for the use of the Chicago policemen, the Essanay Company have obtained a big film scoop in a splendid full reel subject, to be released at an early date, under the title of "A Review of the Chicago Police," an educational subject of real value.

The film depicts 700 picked policemen of Chicago in review, in infantry drills, cavalry charges, motorcycle manoeuvers and other important incidents in the policing of a great metropolitan city. It shows the methods employed by the downtown policemen in directing the traffic; ambulance and patrol runs, etc.

Geo. K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Company said: "We obtained the pictures through the courtesy of the police department, and though they were drilled for several days before the pictures were made, the drills were not made expressly for the Essanay Company. Films of the subject were desired by Capt. Healy of the Chicago Police Department for a series of lectures, dealing with the subject. Much of the negative film exposed is extremely interesting, and we feel sure of our obtaining a splendid release."

Mr. V. R. Day, business manager of the Essanay Company, when asked by a Journal reporter how the deal was made, and what price was paid for the service of the police, said:

"It was a big scoop on the other picture people, and I think they are sore and are making a holler. We did not pay anything for the privilege of making this picture."

The Chicago Journal's article and the assurance by a number of prominent Chicago film men that the subject is one of great importance has awakened considerable interest in Chicago film circles and all are awaiting the appearance of it with eager anticipation.

(Courtesy of Bradley in Chicago Daily News.)

Mr. Bradley, the able cartoonist of the Chicago Daily News sets forth the police attitude toward the motion pictures in the above reproduced cartoon. Mr. Bradley is the first gentleman of the press to call the attention of the public to this injustice, and he has done so in his usually forceful and convincing manner.

It has long been a subject of comment among motion picture men that revolting, improper and almost obscene subjects have been printed, pictured and played, without bringing down upon the heads of writer, player or painter, the wrath which is poured upon a motion picture exhibitor upon the most trivial occasions. Had any motion picture man shown a film of "Salome" or had he used plots similar to several of the recently popular dramas or novels, he would have been driven out of business in short order. We dread to think what might have been his fate had he used some of the features so dear to the producers of so-called musical comedies.

Since the publication of Mr. Bradley's cartoon, the police (or someone, as we understand that the police disclaim any of the accruing credit or discredit) have stopped the production of Salome. Mr. Bradley's picture evidently sunk through the solid ivory skulls of—who knows? We hold no jubilee over the downfall of Miss Garden's artistic production, and it is none of our purpose to discuss here the question of the desirability or otherwise of Salome. Perhaps the nearest that the powers that be could come to a square deal was to curtail the liberties of one faction to make them fit the limitations of the other. There was once a gentleman named Procrastes, who flourished in the age of mythology. Has he "come back?"

TORONTO OPERATORS GIVE BANQUET.

In honor of its first anniversary the Motion Picture Operators Union of Toronto, Canada, gave a banquet at one of the local hotels last week. At the suggestion of H. J. Cohen, manager of the Kleine Optical Co., in Toronto, all the theatrical managers in that city were invited.

The banquet, which was novel in many ways, was attended by a large number of well known theatrical men, who are interested in the organization. All expressed themselves as having a most delightful time, and all wished the organization much prosperity during the coming year. In honor of Thomas Edison, who is looked upon by electricians as the great genius of modern times, a toast was drank to his health.

The menu was also a novel affair, all the licensed manufacturers having the honor of having their firm represented by some wholesome dish on the menu card.

CANADIAN NOTES.

The little city of Chatham, the hub of Ontario's western peninsula, will be the first city in the Dominion to establish a Chautauqua for educational and amusement purposes. Stock is now being subscribed for an auditorium of this description which will seat two thousand people. The men behind the scheme are President N. H. Stevens, of the Canada Flour Mills; Rev. W. J. Spence, rector of Holy Trinity Anglican Church, and P. S. Coate, managing director of the Chatham Gas and Electrical Company.

The primary purpose of the Chautauqua is in educational interests and the promoters hope to be able to present a couple of educational and scenic motion picture films a week with lectures, besides other attractions such as high class music and cultured theatricals. It is not the intention of the promoters to enter into competition with the photoplay theatres, of which there are three, but they will show only educational and scenic films, and the possibilities are that the technical educationists will rent the place one night a week for films along their line of instruction.

A WESTERN WELCOME

Clever Comedy by Melies Soon to be Released

IF we were to record the many different views and attitudes toward married life, it would take volumes of space. Some call it bliss, others call it business and alas! some think it is similar to a place reputed to be very hot. One wise old gazabo who is known to have had considerable experience in the matrimonial line said that he would rather go to jail than to the altar. Assuming that to be true, think what the hardship would be if you had to go to jail in addition to being married. Such was nearly the case in a clever Melies Comedy, "A Western Welcome" soon to be released, and this is the way it all came about:

John and Mary are bride and groom and incidentally head over heels in love with one another. To make their honeymoon enjoyable an Aunt, whom they have never met, and who is the possessor of a western country home, invites them for an indefinite stay at her place. It did not take the young couple long to make up their minds to enjoy the healthful environments of Texas, and to be plain, they were off in a jiffy.

But who could have forseen that just before they arrived in that unsettled country, two convicts should have escaped from their jail wagon? More's the pity, for these rascals in their desperation hold-up the bride and groom and force an exchange of clothing. Now to be made prisoners is no pleasant prospect, even for a bride and groom, and in fact they had no desire to be locked up whatsoever, save in each other's arms.

Meanwhile the desperadoes find the Aunt's invitation in John's pocket and decide to avail themselves of that old lady's hospitality. Auntie is delighted to see them and gives them a bounteous repast as part of their welcome. Her only fault was that she was near-sighted and was not wise to the game being played on her. But "murder will out," and so will guards go out after escaped convicts. When they come upon the two persons in prisoners' suits, however, they do not recognize them as a tearful young bride and her humiliated husband. However the guards give chase to the two in prisoners' costume and the chase ends in the home of Auntie, where the youthful couple are received unto their own and the masqueraders are given just punishment. Thus were the lovers saved from jail, but whether they were better off is a matter which only they can decide.

SCENE FROM MELEIS COMEDY SUBJECT "A WESTERN WELCOME."

The announcement made by Professor Robertson, chairman of the Royal Commission on Technical Education that the commission is seriously considering the advocacy of the use of films in the teaching of technical education in Canada should be of some interest to the manufacturers. Dr. Robertson spoke of the pictures as being a decided asset in several places during his recent tour through Canada. It therefore seems quite feasible to suppose that when the commission make their report on proposed technical education in Canada, they will recommend the use of picture projecting machines in all technical schools in the larger cities.

A well-meaning but too impulsive clergyman got himself in for a lot of unenviable notoriety the other day by publicly suggesting that municipalities should take the photoplay theatres out of private hands and operate them under civic guidance. His proposal for the uplift of the 10-cent picture looked very well in print till a lawyer man who runs picture houses as a hobby made it look as sick as a plug hat in a barnyard. The preacher should have bugged up on law before he went in to tell aldermen what to do. The statutes of Canada strictly forbid municipalities from entering into competition with any legitimate private business enterprise.

Vaudeville seems to be a necessary evil in the picture house. Some managers tried discarding it to find their audiences asking what was the matter. Rank as the "between times" stunts usually are, they seem to fill a groove somewhere in that capricious quantity known as public taste. Until the exhibitors can charge a higher price for admission it seems impossible for them to engage higher priced vaudeville and make decent profits.

A new photoplay theatre has been opened in Inwood, not far from Far Rockaway, N. Y. According to reports the new house is doing a capacity business.

Two new first-class photoplay theatres are to be erected on the south side of Richmond, Va. Vaudeville will be seen in one of the houses.

Albert Taylor is erecting a first-class photoplay theatre on West Broad street, Columbus, Ohio.

BIOGRAPH CO.

"THE GOLDEN SUPPER."—In introducing this classic little can be said, as the theme is so well known both as one of Boccaccio's stories and as the sequel to Tennyson's "The Lover's Tale." Julian loves his cousin and foster sister Camilla, who is wooed and won by Lionel, his friend and rival. He is a witness to their marriage and after the ceremony he departs heartbroken to his own house. Utopian was the existence of Lionel and Camilla, until some time later Camilla is seized with a serious illness, and Lionel's grief knew no bounds when he heard "That low knell tolling his lady dead." "She had lain three days without a pulse; all that looked on her had pronounced her dead. So they bore her—for in Julian's land they never nail a dumb head up in elm—bore her free-faced to the free airs of heaven, and laid her in the vault of her own kin." Julian learns of the death of Camilla, and hastens to the house, arriving in time to see the funeral cortege slowly moving towards the sepulchre. Following in its wake he exclaims, "Now, now, will I go down into the grave, I will be all alone with all I love." So after the train had departed from the vault, Julian enters "and at the far end of the vault he saw Camilla with the moonlight on her face: All the rest of her drowned in the gloom and horror of the vault." Bending over, he kisses her hand, and 'tis then he finds her supposed death is but as sleep, for she revives from out the trance. "He raised her softly, and wrapping her all over with the cloak he wore, bore her through the solitary land back to the mother's house where she was born." Conquering his desire, he goes to bring back Lionel, her husband. Meanwhile, Lionel, grief stricken, determines to become a recluse, going to the deserted cliffs overlooking the sea, where he secures from an old mendicant his thatched hut. After a search, Lionel is located through the meeting of the old man and the searching party. He refuses to go back as he is yet ignorant of Camilla's resuscitation, and so is taken by force. To effect a meeting of Lionel and Camilla without a shock, Julian arranges the Golden Supper, a custom in the East When a man bestowed upon his honored guest his most valued treasure, and acting upon Camilla's injunction, "You have given me life and love again, and none but you yourself shall tell him of it, and you shall give me back when he returns," Julian presents Camilla to Lionel during this supper. Lionel at first cannot realize the truth; he seems to be dreaming, but positive material manifestations awaken him to the reality. Julian's duty performed, he leaves forever.

"HIS SISTER-IN-LAW."—In this Biograph subject is shown a theme so real and so convincing that it becomes an absolute warning. There are certain things that are undeniably irrepressible in life's cycle that there is little use of deluding oneself that he or she is so different. Love is of an indomitable quality that resists even reason. To say that he will never love to the extent of disregarding all else in its favor is idle, for all attempts to temper it will prove futile. Eva and Blanche are two orphan sisters who live with their aunt. They are inseparable, each apparent ly living for the other. They vow that come what will they will never separate. However, when Eva, the eldest, is betrothed to Jack, Blanche, who is but ten years old, seriously objects, fearing that Eva's marriage would surely be the means of their parting one from the other. The wedding takes place and Eva declares that Blanche shall live with her and her husband. It went well until Jack realized that Blanche was dividing Eva's attentions, and in consequence became very much annoyed, despite his endeavors to feel thoroughly satisfied with conditions. Jack finds a third person not so pleasant, and Blanche's solicitation of Eva's attentions occasions several serious quarrels, until she begins to feel that she is in the way. On one occasion, when their tiff is rather more stormy than usual, Blanche is an unseen spectator. The poor little girl now realizes the truth and then decides to go back to her aunt's house to live, leaving the following note to explain her departure: "Darling Sister: I am going back to Auntie's. I am sorry I was a bother to you and Jack. I love you both very much, that is why I can't stay. Blanche." Upon finding this note the young couple are sorry for the way they have acted towards the child, and Jack persuades Eva to go to her aunt's and bring his sister-in-law back. Blanche, however, is not to be moved, and Eva returns in grief without her. She has hardly left when Blanche changes her mind and goes back, but she soon realizes it is not to be for when she enters noiselessly she finds Eva and Jack in each other's embrance arguing that Blanche's absence is all for the best. This decides her finally, and making her way back to her aunt's, she enters to stay for all time. A long time after she is told by her aunt to get ready to visit Eva. Arriving there, she finds a new playmate—a little baby girl. Her surprise is extreme when shown her little niece, and her delight is inexpressible when she is asked to remain with her sister and brother-in-law as a companion to the baby.

"AN EXILE'S LOVE."—Karl, Prince Borclav, exiled from his country, came to America to find employment. Dusty and tired, he turned in, one day, at the gate of a handsome estate. A young man who had just returned from a ride with a beautiful girl was assisting her to alight. As he held her in his arms for an instant, he attempted to kiss her, but was angrily repulsed. The girl proved to be Betty Stevens, daughter of Colonel Stevens, owner of the estate. Karl asked for a job. She called her father and the young man was hired as assistant gardener. It was love at first sight with Karl. As Betty turned to leave him she dropped a glove. He quickly secured it and put it in his pocket. When Betty, later, discovered him in the garden pressing kisses on the glove, she was very indignant—so very, very indignant that she ran to her room and burst into tears and then pressed the glove against her cheek. The young man with whom Betty was first seen returning from a ride was Phil Andrews, a neighbor, who was very anxious to marry her. Angered because she was indifferent to him, he seized her one day in the garden. Karl happened to be near and promptly knocked Andrews down. One afternoon, a groom who was to attend Betty on her ride, fell and hurt himself as he was about to mount. Betty's father saw Karl near and ordered him to take the groom's place. As they started, Andrews appeared and followed at a distance.

Betty saw some flowers at the edge of a cliff. Karl offered to gather them, but she insisted on doing so herself. While thus engaged, she fell over the cliff. Karl was in despair. At the risk of his life he climbed down to her. She was unconscious. Karl took her in his arms to make her more comfortable. Then temptation overcome him and he kissed her. Andrews, who had been peering over the cliff saw this. He rushed down by a round-about path and arrived just as Betty regained consciousness. Angrily, he told her what he had observed. Betty looked at Karl a moment and then put her arms around his neck. Of course, the Colonel raved around when he learned of their marriage, but he soon forgave them. To cap it all, a cablegram arrived stating that Karl's estates, title and military rank had been restored.

"THE MUSICAL RANCH."—This story is full of fun and plenty of interest as well. They certainly did like music on the flying ranch. There was a Mexican who twanged the mandolin, an Indian who beat the drum, a Chinaman who clashed the cymbals and a colored gentleman who rattled the bones. Nora, the good looking cook, liked music too, but unfortunately, Bob, the foreman, couldn't play. He was madly in love with Nora and when she seemed to be charmed with the tunes of a tramp fiddler who happened along Bob grew jealous. He solved the difficulty in a novel way with the assistance of a phonograph—and won her.

"OLD NORRIS' GAL."—Frank Gray, a young lawyer, fails to establish a practice in his native city and decides to go to Idaho and make a fresh start. After hanging out his shingle in his new field of operation he hustles for a clientele, which is not as responsive as he had hoped, and awaiting results he accidentally comes in touch with a case of a young girl, Mary Norris, who has served notice on a saloon-keeper not to sell her father, who is an habitual drunkard, any more liquor. The saloon man tears up the notice, snaps his fingers in her face and asks her who would be fool enough to prosecute the case for her even if he did sell her "old man" more booze.

Frank Gray jumps up and says: "I will prosecute the case." The dispenser of liquid refreshment defies the law; the young attorney makes good and "puts it all over him."

Mary Norris induces her father to leave the place and while escorting him home she accidentally falls over a cliff and is hurt very badly. Her father thinks it was all his fault and, after rushing to her aid, makes a pledge never to drink again and he keeps his word. Mary and her father are very happy in the betterment of things and the young lawyer who always thought her attractive does not hesitate to show it and Mary holds him in marked favor.

The frequenters of the saloon and the proprietor, "Bud" Sykes, have a secret meeting and conspire to kidnap Gray, and make him stop the prosecution of Sykes. An old squaw whom Gray befriended overhears their plan and tells Mary about it. She notifies the Sheriff and he, with a posse of citizens, make a hurried ride, followed by Mary, to the old quarry where the desperadoes have suspended young Gray over its rocky sides trying to induce him to consent to give up the case against Sykes.

They start a fire under the rope attached to Gray and tell him if he does not agree to their demand before the fire burns through the rope he will fall to his death. He refuses to quit the case and declares he will fight, if he can, to the bitter end.

The Sheriff and his men arrive at this point, arrest the villains and save young Gray. Mary cheers and encourages him with her words and presence. At last, "Bud" Sykes is convicted of his offenses through the prosecution of the attorney and everybody is happy. Frank Gray asks Mary to marry him and her father readily gives his consent. All hands give the young couple three hearty cheers and Gray not only wins fame but one of the best women in Idaho.

"THE PHANTOM RIDER."—The lively story of a mysterious highwayman who is visible to the officers of the law until they are about to capture him, when he vanishes in the air to appear again just beyond their reach and lead them into more trials.

The rascal first steals a bicycle and experiences difficulty in learning to operate it, to such an extent that two gendarmes are enabled to almost capture him before he has acquired a working knowledge of the machine. With characteristic gendarme stealth, they come upon him from either side and clutch his clothing, to find that the man has mysteriously disappeared from his garments and is riding gallantly away from them.

The officers now secure a motor car and in a short time overtake him, only to again be duped in the same manner and to have their motor car stolen by the peculiar being while they are trying to recover from the shock his strange methods have given them.

When they next take up the chase they are forced to follow him over routes among the clouds, where he handles the motor car as perfectly as modern aviators do their machines. An accident finally brings him to earth in one long plunge and the force of his fall is kindly broken by the policemen, who manage to find an uncomfortable position immediately in the line of his flight.

"THE CLOSED GATE."—A regiment passing through a little town receives orders to stop there for the night. Immediately lodging tickets are given to the soldiers, who distribute themselves to the various places assigned them. A handsome officer finds he is to be entertained by a young married couple. That evening at the dinner table the lieutenant relates his exploits and gains considerable attention from the wife. When the meal is finished it is necessary for the husband to go to his business, leaving his wife with the lieutenant.

The conversation between the two becomes so animated that the wife neglects to watch her little daughter who is playing in the yard. The baby makes good use of her freedom by finding egress from the yard and is soon lost in the street of the city. When the husband returned his first query was for the child and a search is forthwith commenced.

The mother finds the baby's doll on the bank of the river and accuses herself of having been to blame for the baby's disappearance. In the meantime the child has actually narrowly escaped death several times before, as, if guided by special Providence, she is seen upon the path leading to her home.

Her arrival upon the scene puts to flight the sorrow, and thereafter the gate is closed against flirtatious visitors.

"HEROD AND THE NEW BORN KING."—"Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem, saying, Where is he that is born King of the Jews? for we have seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him.

"When Herod the king had heard these things, he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him.

"And when he had gathered all the chief priests and scribes of the people together, he demanded of them where Christ should be born.

"And they said unto him, In Bethlehem of Judea; for thus it is written by the prophet.

"And thou Bethlehem, in the land of Judea, art not the least among the princes of Juda; for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule my people Israel.

"Then Herod, when he had privily called the wise men, inquired of them diligently what time the star appeared.

"And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, Go and search diligently for the young child; and when ye have found him, bring me word again, that I may come and worship him also.

"When they had heard the king, they departed; and, lo, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was.

"When they say the star, they rejoiced with exceding great joy.

"And when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary, his mother, and fell down, and worshipped him; and when they had opened their treasures they presented unto him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh.

"And being warned of God in a dream that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way.

"And when they were departed, behold the angel of the Lord appeareth to Joseph in a dream, saying, Arise and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word; for Herod will seek the young child to destroy him.

"When he arose, he took the young child and his mother by night, and departed into Egypt."

"THE LITTLE MATCHSELLER'S CHRISTMAS."—A film that will make an instant appeal to the sprit of benevolence abroad at Yuletide. Beautifully and realistically produced.

Little Nellie has been gazing through the window at the passers-by hurrying through the snow, and waiting anxiously for the return of her mother, who is trying to sell a few trifles in the streets to provide the bare necessities of life. The mother returns in despair at her non-success, and Nellie persuades her to let her go for a while instead. The child's efforts are no more effectual, and after gazing through the windows of brightly lighted dwellings where Christmas festivities are in progress, Nellie wanders into a churchyard through which worshippers are passing to a service. Almost frozen with the cold, she strikes all the matches she has to warm her chilled fingers. At length she falls into a stupor, and wakes from a dream that an angel has come to her. The vision fades, and she finds herself in the arms of a policeman, who has found her in time to save her from the sleep of death. A gentleman coming out of church has her taken to his home, and the mother is sent for and provided with the means of spending "a happy Christmas."

"SCENES IN BRITISH INDIA."—The streets of the important city of Bombay, which is first visited, present a scene of bustle and activity unexpected in such a hot climate. Natives in simple costumes are busily engaged in their various occupations, but we do not realize what energy the Hindu is capable of until we see him, with scores of his fellows, getting coal for the big liners in Bombay Harbor. His agility is such that he can trot up a steep, narrow plank with a huge basket full of coal on his head.

Delhi, one of the religious centres of India, and a town redolent with memories of the Mutiny, presents a remarkable contrast to Bombay. Its great temple—the Jumla Masjid—is thronged with devout worshippers, and is a wonderful example of the strength and solidity of Eastern architecture. Its sombre dignity, and the reverent crowds kneeling in its courts form a fitting conclusion to the picture.

"SETH'S TEMPTATION."—The release of the Kalem Co. for Wednesday, December 14, is entitled "Seth's Temptation" and is the first of a new series of Southern pictures made at the Kalem Southern headquarters, "Roseland," on the St. Johns River, Jacksonville, Florida. The Southern Stock Co. is headed again this year by Miss Gene Gauntier and has been greatly augmented and strengthened, and under the direction of Mr. Sidney Olcott, is expected to surpass its efforts for the past two seasons.

"Seth's Temptation" is a story of "Cracker" life; a faithful picture of the poor whites in the South. A young girl of the type puts aside her "cracker" lover in favor of a city chap who happens along to spend the winter. At first the discarded lover cannot realize what has brought about the change in the girl, but he soon learns the real reason, and maddened with jealousy, starts out gunning after his rival. He chances upon him at the spot in the weeds where he has made a tryst with the girl and has almost pulled the trigger which would send a rifle ball crashing into his rival's heart when his better nature asserts itself and for the sake of the girl he gives up his criminal intent. A little later on he has an opportunity to bring about the desired result in a different way. The city chap is drowning and the girl's life is also in jeopardy. The young farmer at the risk of his own life rescues both of them and when they realize the noble nature of the young man the city chap goes on his way and the girl returns to her lover's arms.

We can learn much from children: "From the mouths of babes and sucklings proceedeth much wisdom." In this picture the mother and father, who are suing each other for divorce, are rebuked and reconciled through the playing of a divorce court scene suggested by the actions of their parents. A portrayal that makes a deep impress and teaches a world of good.

The tropical settings in this picture taken among the moss hung live oaks which fringe the St. Johns River are as beautiful as any that have ever been pictured.

"HER INDIAN MOTHER."—This is the title of the Kalem release for Friday, Dec. 16, and as its name indicates, is an Indian story. However, it is an Indian story out of the ordinary, perhaps the best the Kalem specialists in this line have yet produced. The scenes are laid in the Hudson Bay Country in comparatively recent years and cover the life of a Hudson Bay factor showing him as a young man assuming his business in the wilderness and as was common in those days, taking an Indian wife that he had purchased of her father in Indian fashion. A little girl is born of the union and the factor's life is running along ordinary channels until he is unexpectedly called back to Montreal. Here new duties absorb his attention and he soon forgets his home in the wilderness. There is a lapse of sixteen years, during which the little half-breed girl is grown up and her mother has died. A trip of inspection brings the factor back to the familiar scenes of his young manhood. There by chance he happens upon his own daughter. Impressed with her beauty and her likeness to himself he takes her back with him to Montreal, there educates and attempts to train her in the life of a white girl. She succeeds fairly well for a time, but the call of the blood is strong and one day when the flood gates of her memory had bene opened she finds her own buckskin dress, puts it on and slips away to the tribe. There she is found by her heartbroken father in the tepee of a young brave whose squaw she has become and the white man then realizes his loss.

The part of the young girl is played in admirable fashion by Miss Alice Joyce and those who have watched the progress made by this new Kalem favorite will undoubtedly agree that she has done a strong and remarkably convincing piece of work. The scenic embellishments in the picture of Indian life are all true to the story.

"THE LAW AND THE MAN."—It is surprising to what extremes avarice will go to accomplish its object. Just take a good look at Silas Peters, and you can readily see what sort of a scoundrel he is, and we are not at all surprised when he is threatened with legal action for obtaining land for the railroad of which he is president, by fraud, from George Merton. He tries to secure the service of John Turton, a young lawyer whom he thinks he can make use of as a willing tool. Pleased with the offer from the president of a railroad, young Turton accepts the offer.

Not long afterward Miss Claire Merton calls on Turton and asks him to take her father's case against Peters, and when he learns the true state of affairs recognizes that he is being made party to fraud, goes to Peters, asks him to let him see his agreement to act as his attorney, destroys it and becomes counsel for Mr. Merton. The more Turton and Claire Merton are thrown together the more they like each other, until Turton asks Claire to marry him. She consents to become his wife when he wins her father's case.

Peters realizes before long that something must be done to escape conviction. He calls on the judge before whom the case is to be tried and endeavors to bribe him. Peters is indignantly denounced and shown the door. Failing in his first attempt to evade the law, he becomes more desperate, and, with the aid of his lawyer and his scrooging clerk, employs two thugs and pays them to waylay and assault the young lawyer the night before the suit of Merton against Peters is to be tried.

They carry out their villainous scheme; Turton is attacked and left for dead, but his cries are heard and he is carried into the home of Mr. Johnson, who administers to him, and when morning comes assists him to get to court just in time to prevent the villain and his lawyer continuing the trial without him.

The case is decided in favor of Merton and judgment given against Peters and his railroad. John Turton is victorious not only in his suit at law but in his suit for Claire's heart and hand. He makes a double win and proves he is lucky both in love and law.

"PLAYING AT DIVORCE."—Such wisdom often proceedeth out of the mouths of babes and sucklings, and from their example many a wholesome, lasting lesson is taught.

A mother and father prominent in society and well provided with this world's goods, yet unhappy in their marital relations, decide to get a divorce and begin proceedings to that end without delay. While they are busy in separating themselves their children are forgotten and neglected.

The youngsters inadvertently learn of their parents' intention and after an explanation from the oldest one they suggest that they play the girl is getting a divorce from her younger brother while the older boy sits as judge upon the merits of the case. The Judge concludes that a divorce shall be granted. The little girl asks his honor about her dolly, who represents her child.

The question is a knotty one and he takes the child (Dolly) in one hand and a sword in the other, after the manner of Solomon, and proceeds to sever the doll in twain. The little girl cries, "No! Let me keep it." At this moment the mother and father return from their lawyers' offices and listen to the proceeding with humiliation and sorrow.

They ask the children what they are doing. The children tell them and show them the clipping from the newspaper, announcing their own divorce proceedings. They look at each other with tears streaming down their faces and rush into each other's arms in forgiveness and reconciliation; then, clasping their little ones in their arms, the family are happily reunited and the love of the parents is welded by the love and blessings of their children.

"THE INTERNATIONAL MOTOR BOAT RACES."—The first part of this film shows the trial races for the selection of the motor boats as American defenders of the Motor Boat Club of America. From the sound of the starting gun to the finish at the line you are lost in the excitement of the struggle between the little boats as they shoot like torpedoes through the waters of Huntington Bay, L. I. After the Huntington trial and the boats are chosen, the deciding races as to which is the best craft is now pulled off.

Nothing has had so great an International interest as these races, which took place August 20, 1910, at Larchmont, N. Y., on Long Island Sound, for the Harmsworth trophy. The contestants are the Duke of Westminster's "Pioneer"; Daniel Hambury's "Zigarella," representing the Motor Yacht Club of Great Britain.

Representing the Motor Boat Club of America were Frederick K. Burnham's "Dixie II" and "The Nameless," owned by Commodore H. H. Melville and August Heckscher. The trophy was won by "Dixie II," the fastest boat that has ever been launched or sails any body of water.

A beautiful and extraordinary picture is shown at the close of the races when Clifford Harmon is seen flying over the Long Island Sound in his aeroplane just as the boats are crossing the line.

WESTERN COMEDY DRAMA

THE TENDERFOOT MESSENGER ARRIVES AT THE TAVERN

Released Sat., Dec. 17th Length, Approx. 997 ft.

There is a fine vein of clever comedy in this Western dramatic "photofarce," which tells how a tenderfoot messenger, small in stature, but with an abundance of nerve, outwits a band of highwaymen, who endeavor to relieve him of a satchel of money. He not only beats them at their own game, but delivers them to the authorities as well. The film is replete with thrilling dramatic situations, happily relieved by the droll acting of the nervy hero.

A Tangled Masquerade

FARCE COMEDY

Released Tues., Dec. 13th Length, Approx. 1000 ft.

In farce comedy the Essanay players are unequalled. This is a typical Essanay "photofarce," which is equivalent to saying that it is very funny and that the laughs will come in quick response from all who view it. In itself, the story is unusually amusing, rich in clean humor, while the acting, photography and general mounting and management of the scenes are excellent. If you want a big, hearty, wholesome laugh, don't fail to see this picture.

"A DIXIE MOTHER."—"The picture of the year!" This is the general expression of opinion and it seems a very just one. "The Dixie Mother" embodies a variety of emotion which requires the most careful and skillful handling on the part of the author and actors to express. These emotions are the mother love, the wife love, and the love of home and country; the latter confined to that part of the Union, the South in the confederation and rebellion against the North. The love of country is environment or local infused and governed by the love of home and strengthened by the birthplace of those most near and dear to her.

Surrounded by the Union troops the Dixie mother's younger son is afraid to venture outside the house and rejoin his regiment. She urges him to go forth and battle for the cause; places a sword in his hand and again tells him to go, and inspires him with the zeal of her own feelings.

He has hardly left the old mansion with his brother when he is shot dead by a detachment of Union soldiers and his brother is wounded. Rushing from the house, the mother looks upon her dead son, accuses the Union officer of the deed; he shows her he has only a sword and it must have been done by a bullet fired by one of his men. The officer is very courteous and expresses sorrow for her bereavement.

The boy's body is carried into the house. The young officer and the scouts depart, taking prisoner the wounded son, who is sent to a hospital tent of the Union encampment. After the soldiers have gone, the father comes from the secret chamber where he hid upon the approach of the enemy, beholds the body of his boy and swears eternal enmity against the North.

While the wounded son is in the hospital he is attended by a young nurse, a Northern girl, with whom he falls in love and at the same time he and the young officer become fast friends.

After the war the son goes North, marries the young nurse and one year later returns South and sends a letter, knowing his father's hatred, telling his father that he, his Northern wife and baby are at the crossroads. He would like his father to meet them and let the past be forgotten and forgiven in a happy reunion at the old homestead.

The mother gets the letter during her husband's absence. She shows it to him when he gets back. He refuses to listen to her appeal to forget his vow and welcome their boy and his family to their home and hearts. While this is going on, the old colored servant, following his mistress' orders, brings down the cradle in which she had rocked her own children and is now to be at the service of her grandchild.

Heart-broken and worn out by the conflict of country and the greater conflict of her own soul, the poor mother enters the home and when she sees the cradle, her mind gives way at the recollection of her dead boy who once occupied the little bed. Her husband comes into the room, realizes the condition of his wife, relents, kisses her and goes to the cross-roads, meets his son and family, who are accompanied by the young officer whom we saw at the time of the younger son's death, coming back to see the daughter whom he loved at first sight.

They are welcomed by the father and reach the old home just as the mother in her derangement is about to pierce her heart with a sword which is gently taken from her by the Northern officer. Her son places his child in her arms and gradually as she fondles the little one her reason returns with the natural instinct of mother love. She holds the child up to her husband and kisses its tiny hand which holds the stars and stripes in its grasp while he fondly clasps his wife in loving embrace indicative of reunion and peace.

"A TANGLED MASQUERADE."—Paul Dunlap and Ralph Ford both love Helen Moore, whose father favors Paul's suit, and finally forbids Ralph the house. Paul, a hypocrite, has completely won over the old man by his mock saintly ways, and the more manly Ralph, although Helen's favorite, finds that he must carry on his wooing under difficulties.

Hopeless of gaining the father's consent, Ralph decides upon an elopement, and writes Helen, asking her if she will marry him in spite of her father's objection. She writes a reply in the affirmative, making an appointment with him at a coming masquerade, and telling him that she will be costumed as Night, with a star in her hair. Her father discovers her in the act of writing the note and forces her to show it to him. Wrathful at first, he suddenly conceives a plan to put an abrupt end to Ralph's unwelcome wooing. He feigns to give into Helen's pleading and allows her to send the note.

However, the old man's sudden generosity has a long strong string to it. On the night of the masquerade, immediately after Helen's costume has arrived, father tells her that he will attend the ball, and that he will do so in the costume intended for her. Forbidding her to leave the house, father goes blithely to the ball, garbed as Night, and chuckling over the anticipated discomfiture of Ralph.

But father's plan, though well laid, is upset by Paul. This young gentleman has the prying disposition that fits so well with his general character, and Helen's note, intended for Ralph, has fallen into his hands. Not for a moment does he scruple to open it and take advantage of the information gained. It's Paul for the masquerade, to seek out the lady who is costumed as Night.

Father has scarcely left the house before Helen calls Ralph on the 'phone to warn him of father's plan. Explanations over the 'phone follows, and the young people decide that while father is disporting himself with Paul at the masquerade, they will take advantage of the opportunity to elope. Ralph is soon on his way to the house, where he joins Helen, and the two go at once to find a minister.

Paul, at the masquerade, meets father, and thinking him Helen, proposes that they elope. Father, thinking Paul is Ralph, delightedly assents, and they set out for the minister's, chance leading them to the same divine selected by Ralph and Helen.

Ralph and Helen, married, are just about to leave the parsonage, when father and Paul, in costume, are ushered in. Paul, surprised, tears the mask from father, and Ralph performs a like office for Paul, who thoroughly scared, rushes from the room. Father sees no other course than for him to give his blessing to Ralph and Helen, and he does so with the best grace he can command.

"THE TENDERFOOT MESSENGER."—In this striking portrayal of the West, the story revolves around the cleverness of Shorty Blair, the express messenger, who, by his tenderfoot appearance, manages to carry the most valuable packages through the bandit infested country in which he operates.

In this story Shorty is intrusted with $50,000, and, knowing that the probability of being held up, he carefully conceals his identity and poses as the greenest of green tenderfeet, completely hoodwinking the proprietor of the roadhouse at which he is forced to wait for the stage.

A band of outlaws, operating near the junction, are apprised by their pal, Kelly, in the employ of the express company, that a messenger is passing through and must stop at the Wild Steer Tavern. They come in full force that night of Shorty's arrival, tell the proprietor, who is in league with them that they know the messenger and the money are in the house, and demand that he be given up. The proprietor, fooled by Blair's innocent appearance, tells them that he has no guest but a tenderfoot, who knows as much about riding express as a mule does about paradise. However, they put considerable faith in their pal's tip, and insist upon searching the effects of the "tenderfoot," and they start for his room.

Early in the evening Blair has shown a slight kindness to Nell, the daughter of Mac, the proprietor, and she overhearing the plans of the band, goes to his room and warns him. Taking his precious bundle of

Released Friday, Dec. 23 Length 963 Feet

"When Lovers Part" is a pathetic story, a little on the line of "The Soldier Sweetheart" which many wfll remember. She attempts to elope but this plan is frustrated. Then both father and lover go away to the war and the girl is left alone, broken hearted. Weary days go by and then the war draws to a close. But the father comes back in a casket draped with the flag, while the lover returns full of honors to claim his bride.

In introducing this classic, little can be said, as the theme is so well known both as one of Boccaccio's stories and as the sequel to Tennyson's "The Lover's Tale." Julian loves his cousin and foster-sister Camilla, who is wooed and won by Lionel, his friend and rival. Lionel and Camilla are married, but their happiness is shortlived, as apparent death overtakes Camilla. After she is laid in the tomb, Julian visits her and to his amazement finds her supposed death but a trance. Reviving her, he takes her to the home of her mother, where at the Golden Supper he presents her to her heart-crushed husband Lionel, lifting him from the slough of despair.

"AN OLD SILVER MINE IN PERU."—This is a short but interesting and instructive film showing an old silver mine worked by native Indians in just the same manner that was employed three hundred years ago. While all the wonders of the modern civilization were being wrought, these people have gone on for centuries in the same way, living their lives of toil without a murmur of discontent and probably with no knowledge of the great world beyond them, or no thought that the methods employed by them in mining the precious metal were possible of improvement.

In our film we see the miners, their forms bent to the earth from toil, carrying the ore up from the depths of the mine. Dumping their loads at the mouth of the mine, they return for more, while others arrive, fill their "capachas," or small leather bags, with the ore and carry them on their backs to the Chili mill. This consists of a huge stone roller propelled by water power, and on it and under it are tossed shovels full of the ore to be ground up in water. The mixture is then conducted to large vats where it is allowed to settle; the water is first drained off, the ore reduced by treatment with quicksilver, and then follows a native process of smelting which is crude in the extreme.

With the wonders of steam and electricity now made common, everyday events, the film seems to give us a glimpse back into the Dark Ages. To see it is like reading a page from ancient history.

"A MOUNTAIN MAID."—The main idea of this story is original and a long way out of the beaten path of love stories and picture dramas. Although it is a theatrical story in the true sense of the word, many of the scenes are laid in the mountains of Tennessee, and they are exceptionally beautiful in their character.

The story opens in the office of a prominent theatrical manager and shows conversations first with his leading man, and, after the latter's departure, with the little leading lady of a new play called "The Mountain Maid," which is to be put out when the fall season opens. Both of the young players, who are unknown to each other, decide to go after local color, and by one of the chances of fate they select the same part of the Tennessee mountains. Of course they meet, and the manner of their meetings and the things that happen to them make up the story. In order to live up to the character fully the little leading lady dresses as a mountain girl when she arrives at the cottage where she has engaged board, and a very attractive mountain maid she makes. For the same reason the leading man attires himself in native costume, and makes a stalwart and herioc looking mountaineer. They meet accidentally several times and the acquaintance ripens slowly.

Finally, one day late in the summer, while wandering through the woods together, they discover some moonshine whiskey buried under the leaves, showing that a still is not far off. Understanding the situation the young man promptly replaces the whiskey and takes the girl away from the spot, but they have been seen by the moonshiners, who believe the man to be a revenue officer in disguise. They surround his house that night, but fortunately the girl, who has gone to their trysting place and hidden there to surprise her lover, happens to overhear the plot to capture the young man, and is able to reach his house ahead of the crowd of moonshiners and notify him so that he can get away. Consequently, when in the moonlight the armed men face his door and call upon the young man to appear, he fails to respond to the summons.

And then comes the last scene of the play, the first rehearsal of "The Mountain Maid" on the stage. We see the company assembled and the leading people appear, one at a time. Finally they are given their parts, but so far these "co-stars" have not met each other or taken especial notice of who is to play the opposite character. The climax of the piece, which is one of mingled comedy and heart interest, is reached when the two young people, parts in hand and studying their lines, happen to look up from the manuscripts into each other's eyes.

The story is pretty in itself and beautifully played. The scenic environments are exceptional, and every audience will enjoy the surprise of the young people and the final disclosure which each person will have anticipated in advance for the young lovers.

"PIGS IS PIGS."—The very title of this film will suggest unlimited possibilities and probabilities for fun and laughter. Ellis Parker Butler's popular story has been transferred to the silent drama field, bringing with it all of the quaint characters and uproarious farcical situations that it conveys.

The story begins with the ordering of two guinea pigs for Mr. Morehouse's small boy, to be shipped to the familiar express office where Mike Flannery, the thick-headed express agent insists that the rate on two guinea pigs should be thirty cents, because "dago pigs is pigs." Mr. Morehouse points to the rates on pets, which is twenty-five cents, and a violent argument ensues, the end of which is that Mr. Morehouse retires from the office in a high dudgeon, refusing to pay the amount or to accept the consignment.

He writes to the company. The letter is received at the company office and travels through the various departments in its own leisurely and circuitious way; then Mr. Morehouse gets a reply at the end of a couple of weeks referring him to the Claim Department of the company. Of course, he is very wroth and proceeds to write an immediate rebuke to the great corporation. Meanwhile the little family of two pigs has increased somewhat, and Flannery is obliged to provide a little larger quarters for the half dozen that are now in existence.

Mr. Morehouse's letter to the express company goes through the usual routine, and again he receives a reply referring him to the Tariff Department in the matter. His rage now exceeds all bounds and he proceeds to lay himself out—and the company as well. Again there is a long lapse of time while the company considers the matter and passes it through the usual channels. Meanwhile the family of pigs in Flannery's care is constantly growing and consuming more and more cabbages. They now have a pen which occupies a large part of his little express office.

Finally the express company refers the matter of the classification of guinea pigs to a professor who is supposed to be in Atlanta, Georgia, but who is in reality at the farthest end of the earth and who consequently does not receive the letter asking his opinion until some months have passed. By the time his reply comes back Flannery's unhappy family has increased so that it occupies all of the available space in the office, ant he is obliged to climb over pens and boxes of pigs in order to transact the business of the place. He grows more and more desperate, but also more and more determined to stick to the law as it is laid down in the company's tariff book.

And then the company, receiving the professor's learned decision, decides that guinea pigs are not pigs but pets, and informs Mr. Morehouse that he may have his consignment at the twenty-five cent rate. He calls at the office in triumph, with half the village behind him to see his glory at having downed a great corporation. Of course, Flannery is delighted at being relieved of his great burden and gladly offers Mr. Morehouse his consignment, which now consists of several thousand guinea pigs. Mr. Morehouse, however, has no notion of taking more than two, and when the stormy scene finally ends Flannery is still possessor of the pigs. And then he has a brilliant inspiration, and acting upon it with unusual alacrity for his slow head, he ships off all the pigs to the home office in the city with a characteristic note in which he expresses his gratitude that the guinea pigs didn't happen to be elephants.

The story speaks for itself, and the characterizations carry it out to the limit of comicality. There is small room for doubt that the film will easily take the first place among the month's comedies.

"THE RED CROSS SEAL."—New York City with its five million inhabitants is quite naturally a city of extremes. Like all great cities, it touches the highest and the lowest in the social scale. Manhattan Island is a miniature world in itself. All the races of the civilized globe are housed between its waterways; extreme poverty stretches forth its hand in supplication to ample wealth; ignorance staggers blindly onward amidst monuments of wisdom; science shouts forth its warning cry to the deaf; self-sacrificed and suffering hide their wounds neath tattered rags, and the White Plague creeps into the darkened room and foul smelling houses of the ignorant and of the unthinking, unwashed and unlistening, and calls its victims home.

These are just the conditions that Edison's latest silent drama places before your gaze—not in a repulsive picture, but in one that is bound to reach the hearts and minds of millions. It is a Kipling's begging poem of "pay, pay, pay" in silent drama. In silence it asks you for but one penny; it asks you to be a co-worker in stamping out the White Plague of tuberculosis in every quarter of the globe; it shows you actual conditions which exist in New York City, and the same is true in London and Paris and all the great commercial centers. Most of the scenes are actual reproductions from photographs. This picture is not a medical treatise, nor a Christian Tract, but a strong dramatic story that brings the moisture to your eyes and leaves a smile of gladness on your lips.

Here we are shown the girl of the tenement district who is struggling for existence in the poor quarters by painting designs upon paper baskets and lamp shades and into whose life has crept a longing for a brighter future in the field of art. She visits a school of art and learns that her poor wages are far too small to allow her to lift herself out of her present surroundings. Her sad face attracts the attention of a young man of wealth and sets him to thinking. He decides to see how the other half of the world lives, so donning old clothes, he secures a room in the cheap tenement where she lives; and here a new world opens before his gaze—a world of poverty and want, a world of suffering and sickness. He keeps his identity concealed and watches the progress of events.

He sees the young girl struggling for existence—sees her striving to win the prize for the Red Cross stamp design for Christmas time. He sees her success—she has won the prize! How bright the future is before her! And here he also sees what sacrifice means in its noblest form. She gives up her future, her little prize money that means so much to her, so that her neighbor's son might be cured of the awful White Plague; and here the young man also sees that he has fallen in love with a noble, self-sacrificing girl. She does not know or even suspect that her greatest sacrifice has won for her a glorious future, a great love, and great riches until the closing scene of the drama.

Intermingled with these views of the Silent Drama, we are shown the actual conditions that breed tuberculosis, the work of the district nurses, the open-air day-camp of the Tuberculosis Association on top of the Vanderbilt Clinic, the right way to live and the wrong way to exist. It shows the conditions of the tenement district, which are fast being done away with through the aid of the Tuberculosis Association and the good derived from the Red Cross stamps sold at Christmas time. A wonderful picture of appeal—a lesson—a drama. Not alone that, but the Edison Company is proud to say that this picture has the sanction of the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis and the American National Red Cross, and that if because of it a single individual buys one stamp more to decorate his Christmas gifts with, it has accomplished its purpose in presenting to the motion picture world a strong, sweet story of sacrifice and love.

ous by the late Neil Burgess) the typical Yankee spinster, whose heart is as soft as her tongue is sharp, whose home was the refuge of pretty Sally Greenaway who loved the stalwart young farmer Joel Bartlett who worked "the farm" on shares with Aunt Abby. We see Aunt Abby take to her heart the mischievous, slangy little "City Waif 'Taggs'," who has been sent to her from New York and who turns out to be her dead sister's child. We see her protecting "Taggs" and "Tim the Tanner," a little chap, formerly a jockey, from arrest by the constable Solon Hammerhead, a hard-fisted skinflint, who wants to marry Abby and when she refuses his offer of marriage, threatens to foreclose the mortgage he holds on the farm. We see her trying to make big, fat awkward Otis Tucker tell his love for her after ten years of silent courtship. We see the life of the farm in the bright June days, the corn husking, the country dance in the old red barn, see Tim the Tanner training the farm horse, which he has entered in the running race at the "County Fair" unknown to Aunt Abby. We see them driving to the "Fair" all dressed up in their "go to meetin'" clothes and see the race between the flying thoroughbreds, see little Tim riding like a demon on "Cold Molasses" now, in the lead, then pocketed under whip and spur forge ahead in the stretch and dash under the wire a length to the good, the winner of the purse that pays off the mortgage on Aunt Abby's farm.

"A TALE OF THE SEA."—Tom and Bill become two unseparable partners when Tom saves the latter from a watery grave. They live very comfortably together in a small hut, and when Tom starts to pay attention to Sallie, a pretty seashore lassie, Bill considers "the old female" an intruder and watches the progress of the love match with jealousy. One evening Tom confesses to his partner that he is about to be married. and this so enrages Bill that he knocks Tom down and leaves the room.

After the wedding Tom and his bride meet Bill, who refuses to recognize his old friend. He leaves a note for Tom saying that since he has married "the old female" he would only be in the way and therefore was leaving on a long voyage.

Five years elapse. Sallie is sitting at the sea shore playing with her two little youngsters, and Bill, who just returned from his trip, meets them by chance. The chubby faces and pretty blue eyes of the little ones soften Bill's heart, and before he is aware of it he is reconciled to his old friend and "the old female." The two friends leave with a fishing cruise, and Tom and Bill are given the task of spreading the nets. They enter the little boat, and when high out at sea a storm overtakes them; they are driven for miles out in to the unknown, at the mercy of the sea. Only a few drops of water are left in the flask, and Bill sees the chance where he can make reparation. He writes the following note: "Tom, the others have died; only you and I are left. There's water enough in the cask for one only, and I ain't got no kids or wife waiting for me, old pard. Good-bye, Bill." This he pins to Tom's coat and then jumps into the sea. Tom awakes; is startled by the disappearance of his friend. Just then a large vessel comes into sight and Tom is rescued.

On the seashore Sallie and her children are looking out upon the sea, praying for the safe return of their beloved ones. Tom finally returns; there is a hearty welcome. Sallie asks for Bill, and Tom, unable to speak, silently points to the sea.

PATHE FRERES.

"IN HER FATHER'S ABSENCE."—Arabella's father does not approve of Alphonso's attentions to his charming daughter. Yet, although her father is excitable and fiery-tempted, Alphonso decides to call when the old man goes out. Barely, however, has he been greeted by Arabella before there is a violent ring at the door bell. In a second he has sought refuge in a huge closet, whilst his frightened companion rushes to open the door. It is only a messenger from the milliner, and Alphonso learns that he may come out. He overturns the closet in so doing and before he has time to recover his mental balance there is another loud ring at the door. A fresh hiding place has to be discovered, and the same comedy is repeated again and again, Alphonso finding refuge successively in a big coal box, a washing tub, and the wine cellar. Finally the father really does return and Alphonso, after doing havoc in the wine cellar, is forced to escape from that ignominious place as best he can.

"The JULIANS."—Ten acrobats give a first-class display. Perilous feats, which include remarkable somersaults, the building up of human ladders and swift leps into the air, are an integral part of the exhibition.

"HOBOES' XMAS."—The scene opens in a market store where the proprietor finds one of the cases of turkeys shipped to him off color. He repacks the case and marks the label "Returned Bad." He takes them to the depot, where they are loaded on the express car of a train to be returned to the farmer who had shipped them. It is the day before Christmas, and a party of hoboes are assembled in an old stone quarry discussing how to enjoy the holiday. They decorate a tree brought from a nearby wood with old tin cans, etc. But what is the good of a tree without a meal. A happy thought strikes one of them. They will hold up a train and get money from the passengers. In a few minutes they are on the railroad track. One flags the train, and as it stops the others rush up and make the passengers line up. Alas, they are suburbanites returning from their Christmas shopping in New York with empty pockets. None of them have any money left. The hoboes detach the express car and send the train on its journey. They find a case of turkeys in the car, and each takes one. Food was all that they required. They go to the quarry and, cooking the turkeys, commence to eat. All are soon in agonies, and one of them discovers the label on the case marked "Returned Bad." This makes them feel worse. Meantime the police have been informed and a squad has been hurried by rail to the scene of the affair. In their helpless condition the hoboes can make no attempt at escape and they are marched off to jail to spend their Christmas day.

"CHARLIE AND KITTY IN BRUSSELS."—Two mischievous youngsters living outside Brussels fasten their go-cart to their parents' auto and are carried into the city. They detach their cart and wander around and look at some of the sights. The most interesting of these are the Royal Palace and the City Hall, with its ancient architecture. Mounting a trolley car they continue and visit in turn the railroad depot, the Stock Exchange and various other places of note. Finally they arrive in the suburbs, where, after removing some cans of milk from a dog-drawn cart, they get inside and start home.

"LITTLE SNOWDROP."—The second wife of King Othon is the fairest lady in the land, and the possessor of a magic mirror which tells her often that her beauty is unrivaled. There comes a day, however, when the mirror tells her that her stepdaughter, Little Snowdrop, excels her in beauty. The jealous queen resolves that Snowdrop must die. She summons a hireling and orders him to destroy the girl, and bring her proof of her death. The servant wanders into the forest to lie in wait for Snowdrop, but when the girl comes strolling through the leafy glades, her beauty and youthful innocence touch his heart, and he tells her to fly into the forest out of her stepmother's reach. He takes her handkerchief, which he afterwards stains with the blood of a pigeon, and gives it to the queen. Snowdrop, left alone plunges deep into the forest, and at last comes to the house of the Seven Dwarfs. They hospitably receive her, and beg her to stay with them. In the meantime the queen has learned from her mirror that Snowdrop still lives and where she is. She decides to destroy her herself, and, disguising herself as a beggar, she takes a basket of lace, seeks out the unfortunate girl and strangles her with a piece of lace. The Dwarfs return in time to save Snowdrop from death, and the queen, on reaching the palace, learns from her mirror that she still lives. She returns to the Dwarfs' house with a basket of poisoned apples, and Snowdrop, having tasted one, falls unconscious. This time, the skill of the Dwarfs is unavailing. They place her in a crystal coffin among the big boulders on the mountain. Scarcely have they placed the coffin on the ground when a gay cavalcade of mounted men, headed by a noble prince, appears in sight. The Dwarfs disappear, and the Prince, dismounting, approaches the coffin. He lifts the lid and, withdrawing the piece of poisoned apple from Snowdrop's mouth, restores her to life. Then, wondering at her beauty, he hears her story, mounts her before him on his horse, and carries her in triumph to her father's palace, where her return is celebrated with much rejoicing, and to the discomfiture of the wicked queen.

"SAVED BY DIVINE PROVIDENCE."—Widow Robinson's little son is taken sick and dies, leaving the poor woman, who is only just able to eke out an existence, disconsolate. Mrs. Hirst, the wife of a wealthy broker, takes her little son Harry in the park to play. While engrossed in her book he wanders away, and is found some time later by Mrs. Robinson.

She sees that he is lost and leads him back to the park. There is no trace of his mother. Struck by the resemblance to her poor son, she decides to take him home and adopt him. Seven years pass by. Harry is a strong, healthy lad, but the poor widow is dying of consumption. Feeling her end is near, she tells him how she found him. She bids him get a bundle from her trunk, and shows him the clothes he was wearing on that day. A few minutes after this disclosure the poor woman dies. Little Harry is alone in the world without friends or money. He takes the bundle of clothes and sets out on life's hard journey. At night he tries to sleep on a wharf by the river. Two of a gang of newsboys who have improvised a sleeping place under an old pier pass by. They see Harry's absolute misery and take him with them to their bed of straw. Next day they start him with a stock of papers to sell on the streets. His first day's work finished, Harry turns into a church, and while dozing there is comforted by a vision of Christ that appears to him. It is the seventh anniversary of his disappearance and Mrs. Hirst visits the nursery, that has not been disturbed since that time. She sits down and cries heartily, thinking of what might have been. As she dreams, Christ appears and shows her successively a vision of her boy found by the widow—the widow's death—Harry selling papers on the streets—and finally of his home under the pier. She rushes to her husband and together they start out. Aided by a friendly policeman who knows this gang of newsboys, they find their way to the pier. They soon discover Harry. He tells them of the widow's deathbed story of how she had found him, and shows them the clothes he wore the day he was found. There can be no mistake, and Harry that night is again back in a warm bed in his father's luxurious home, comforted by a mother's love.

Problems of the Photoplay Operator Discussed and Questions Answered

Edited by Will C. Smith

SETTING SHUTTER AND CONDENSERS.

E. W. D., Lock Haven, Pa., writes:—Would like to know focal length of condensers for 12x 17 ft. picture at 94 feet and how to set shutter on the Power's No. 6 Machine.

Answer—I would recommend that you try two 8-in. Condensers for the size picture wanted at 94 feet. If these do not answer the purpose try one 7½-in. and one 8-in. Condenser but I am of the opinion that the 8-in. Condensers will be correct. As to the timing (or setting) of shutter on the Power's No. 6 Machine, you unloosen the set screw on inside collar and set the wide wing (or blade) the one with the Power Company's imprint on it is the wide wing, so that the top will show about one-half of the light just as your intermittent sprocket is about to move; then tighten the set screw on the inside collar. Also see that set screw on outer collar is tight in spindle groove.

La Crosse, Wis., writes asking how to measure the focal length of condensers and how to adjust the shutter on the Power's No. 5 Machine.

Answer—As to how to measure the focal length of Condensers—hold the condensing lens with the flat side to a piece of white paper pinned to the wall (and move it in and out) being sure to hold it direct with the paper, using the window as an object to focus, until the image on the window is sharp and distinct on the paper. Then measure from the paper to the flat side of the condensing lens. This will give you the focus of the condenser. To adjust the shutter on the Power's No. 5 Machine unloosen the shutter on its spindle and turn the flywheel in the same direction it runs until the intermittent sprocket has completed its movement and the cam-pin is just one-half way out of the star slot, then turn the shutter in the same direction it runs until the lower left hand corner of the aperture is open about a quarter of an inch, or until the edge of the shutter strikes a trifle less than one-half way up the side of the aperture opening and about one-half across the lower edge as the intermittent stops traveling, a little bit before the pin leaves the star. This adjustment means that the shutter just begins to open as the intermittent stops traveling. Then tighten screws in the set collar on the shutter spindle.

BAD TENSION.

Bridgeport, Ct., writes that his film jumps off the lower sprocket at times and that his picture shows white lines, especially on the titles. Have tried everything but without success. Can you help me out?

Answer—The cause of film jumping off lower sprocket might be due to the fact that your lower sprocket is not in line with your intermittent sprocket. This would cause the film to jump off the lower sprocket; or, the tension spring holding the bracket roller on the lower sprocket may be weak so that when a patch comes through it throws the film off of the lower sprocket. To remedy this would suggest that you line your lower sprocket with your intermittent sprocket and also put on a heavier tension spring. As to the white lines on titles, this would indicate that your shutter is out of time with your picture. To remedy this set the wide wing so that it just covers the aperture to within about one-quarter of an inch on lower left hand corner when the intermittent starts to move. While the intermittent is moving the wide wing should cover the aperture.

FOCUS.

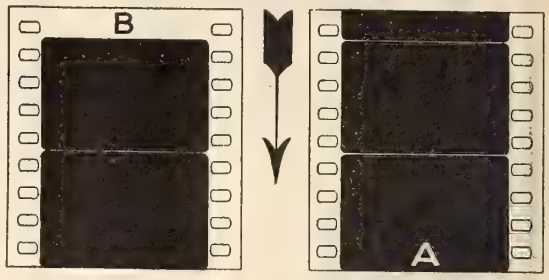
Lafayette, Colo., writes:—I have been a reader of the Projection Department of The Film Index for the past few weeks and have received some good solid information that has helped me a great deal in my work. I would like to have you answer a question or two in your columns if you can spare the space. How do you figure the focal length of the Projection and the Stereopticon Lens? I have a 47 ft. throw and a picture 13½x10 ft. What is the focal length of the lens? I am using a 6½-in. and a 7½-in. Condenser with the thin one next the arc. What is size of thin condenser and how do the sizes run? Am using 110 volt-60 cycle current and a current saving device and the bottom carbon burns about one-third faster than the upper one. What can I do to stop this?

Answer.—To figure the focal length of the projection lens multiply the size of the (slide) or (film) opening by the distance from lens to the screen. Then divide the result by the sum of the others. Would advise you to get a copy of The Film Index of October 29, 1910, and on page 3 you will see an article on the "Principles of Optical Projection." As to the focal length of the projection lens for the throw wanted, would say about a 2½-in. equivalent focus would suit you. The thin condenser is 7½-in. focus. As a rule, the thick condenser is used next to the lamp (arc), and the thin one next to the screen, but this rule does not always follow. Some operators use the thin condenser next to the lamp (arc) claiming that they get better results, but at the distance you are working from I would say that 6½-in. and 7½-in. would be about the right condensers to use, using the 6½-in. (thick one) nearest the lamp (arc). Condensers come in different sizes: 6½-in., 7½-in., 8½-in. and 9-in. focus. You do not mention what style lamp you are using, although I see no reason why your lower carbon should burn faster than the upper one on alternating current, unless the lower part of your lamp (arc) is shorter than the upper part. All lamps are supposed to be made so that they will burn on alternating current evenly. Would like to hear from you and I might mention that in sending in letters it is very essential that you sign your name.

HOW TO MAKE A PATCH.

W. W. D., Los Angeles, Cal., writes which way is correct to make a patch and why?

Answer.—The correct way to make a patch is to take the film as it travels through the machine and cut it across the dividing line and cut the other part of film about one-eighth of an inch from the dividing line. Clean the emulsion off and use a good cement. Then patch it so that the film as it comes out of the magazine will lap on the inside of the film. The emulsion side of the film should always face the light as it comes out of the upper magazine. Why this is the correct way is that with a patch made that way it will pass through the upper magazine, over and under the sprockets and over the aperture plate without any possible chance of interference and then through into the lower magazine. This is rather a difficult question to explain in writing and it may be well to submit the following cut.



Put A on B as the film comes out of the upper magazine, while giving a show. Naturally it will be upside down, so by putting A on B, the film would travel without any possible chance of interference.

LOST MOTION.

Lock Haven, Pa., writes: How can I tighten gears, as I have considerable lost motion?

Answer.—As to the lost motion in your gears I would advise a new toggle joint. This is usually the first place you have lost motion and the only place that it would make any material difference in your picture, as far as the gears are concerned. You do not say what machine you are using. Would like to hear from you as to make of machine you are using and can then advise you just what to do. However, if your film jumps up and down or moves sideways on the screen what you want to do to eliminate that lost motion is to loosen the set screws holding the bushings in the framing-carriage of machine and use a screw-driver in the slots of the bushings, making very sure that the star and cam fit snug. Then tighten the set screws in the framing-carriage holding bushings and this will eliminate the jumping of film up and down. If, after doing this, you find it helps you as far as the film jumping up and down is concerned, but that you still have the film moving sideways, then you want to loosen the set screws again holding the bushings and move the bushings closer to the intermittent sprocket; then tighten the set screws. It is possible that the pins holding the intermittent sprocket or spindle are loose and this would cause lost motion in the sprocket, but I am of the opinion that the lost motion you speak about is in the intermittent sprocket, and if adjusted as advised, I am sure you will eliminate all your lost motion. It is also possible that your eccentric bushings are worn. If so, would advise a new set. The whole thing as to the setting of eccentric bushings is to set them, so as to eliminate the lost motion between the star and cam and at the same time keeping the two shafts (star and cam) exactly parallel to each other.

J. W., Bermuda, writes that he has read the Operators' Column in The Film Index with great pride and has tried the using of two rheostats in multiples on 110-volt alternating current, and the results he has obtained are marvellous.

The only answer to this is that it is very gratifying to know that the humble efforts of the writer of this column are appreciated and taken advantage of in the right direction by operators. Again, I must impress upon everyone who may ask questions to be answered in this column, that it is very essential that they sign their names to all inquiries, as I positively refuse to answer any inquiries that are not signed.

Getting Stricter With Moving Picture Operators.

I recently received from Wm. H. Havill, city examiner of moving picture operators, a copy of the new form of application for license to be filled out by applicants. I notice that the requirements are much stricter than formerly and that every applicant must furnish the vouchers of two responsible citizens of Chicago.

Four questions must be answered in each of these vouchers, viz.:

How long have you been acquainted with the applicant?

Is he of good habits?

What experience has he had as a moving picture operator?

Is applicant a fit person to operate moving picture machines and devices?

The applicant must give, with other statements, the names and addresses of his employers within the past year, his total experience on moving picture machines, whether he has ever been examined in any other city, where he has received instruction, and if addicted to the excessive use of alcoholic liquors or of injurious drugs, etc.

All applicants will be examined at the office of the Board of examiners, unless the examiner approves of an examination elsewhere, as to the applicant's practical knowledge of moving picture machines and his ability to operate before an audience.

Any false statement made by an applicant in the application blank will be cause for the revocation of a license, in case such has been issued. The filing of an application does not entitle an applicant to have charge of, or to operate, a moving picture machine pending an examination. License must first be obtained.

Chicago's Police Force in Film.

The Essanay Co. created quite a stir in the city last week by filming over 700 of Chicago's finest (policemen) in Grand Park. The men will appear in marches and various evolutions, the final scene showing the stopping of a runaway team by a mounted policeman. Mounted policemen, motor cycle men and patrolmen participated in the exhibition. The film, which will be of full length, will be a special release.

Fine Singing at Alcazar.

I saw the "Maid of Niagara" at the Alcazar one evening last week and was much pleased with the fine photography and technique of the film. One could see that the subject held the audience with strong grip. I here take the opportunity to congratulate the Alcazar management on the fine singing voices employed for illustrated songs. If other theatres would profit by this example, many sensitively eared people would be spared torture and the pictures seen to better advantage.

Chicago Film Brevities.

I was much interested by Jeannette L. Gilder's review, in the Chicago "Tribune," of "Edison, His Life and Inventions" by Frank Lewis Dyer and Thomas Commerford Martin. Miss Gilder's extracts from the work read like a romance, and show that the Wiard had to fight his way to the top from very small beginnings.

C. J. Schafer, of the Garfield theatre, 2644 West Madison street, has discontinued vaudeville and arranged for a film service, costing $125 weekly, with the American branch of the General Film Co. The Garfield is one of the finest houses on the West Side and seats 800 people.

Manager Van Ronkel, of the American branch of the General Film Co., informs me that on Monday, December 5, his books showed a net gain of 14 new customers. All of these were taken away from the "independent" ranks.

C. Abrams has rented the Lawndale Palace theatre, at 26th street and Kedzie avenue. The house formerly offered vaudeville and "independent" film, which proved a failure. Manager Abrams has discontinued the vaudeville and has installed a good quality licensed service.

Jimmie Ferris, formerly manager of the Boston theatre, and now manager of the Foster theatre, at Evanston and Foster avenues, played the role of the rooster in the great masquerade scene of Essanay's film, "A Tangled Masquerade." Please notice Jimmie's walk as he climbs the stairs. Where did he get it? "A Tangled Masquerade" will be released December 15.

Joseph Grein, manager and owner of the Clark theatre, at 4543 North Clark street, was seen last week at the Spoor branch of the General Film Co. Manager Grein opened the Clark with moving pictures and vaudeville early in November, and is playing to fine business. The Clark is a magnificent house and seats 1,200 people. Mr. Grein has girl ushers dressed in natty uniforms who, in addition to waiting on patrons, contribute to their pleasure by joining in the chorus of the illustrated songs.

B. F. Haskins, owner and manager of the Majestic theatre, Watertown, Wis., visited the city last week and called on the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co., to arrange for a high quality service. Manager Haskins says he is doing very fine business at present, but that he had formerly a very sad experience with "independent" service, which he discarded.

Messrs. Teets & Pettibone, owners of the Park theatre, 2051 Milwaukee avenue, concluded arrangements for a good quality service last week with the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co. The Park theatre formerly used "independent" service, but commencing Monday, December 5, a licensed service was installed.

F. W. Fennekin, owner and manager of the Grand Electric theatre, Gloucester, O., has reopened his house after making extensive alterations and improvements. He was a caller at the office of the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co. last week.

Gardner & Leonard, owners of the Electric theatre, Virden, Ill., which will be opened December 9, were in the city last week and arranged with the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co. for "Uncle Tom's Cabin" for the opening.

F. M. Cory, manager of the People'e theatre, a vaudeville and picture house, and of the People's Electric, a straight picture house, Petosky, Mich., was in the city last week and concluded arrangements with the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co. for a film service for his vaudeville house. Manager Cory expresses himself as well pleased with business and the outlook.

The Firemen's Benefit Association, of Evanston, Ill., completed arrangements last week to use a complete Kinodrome service for their benefit which will be given from Wednesday, December 7 to 9, inclusive. Specially selected films pertaining to fire subjects will be presented on the occasion.

A new ruling has just gone into effect in Indianapolis which permits only the exhibition of moving pictures on Sunday, vaudeville being eliminated. In consequence, the Park theatre, owned by Schafer & Ziegler, and the Grand theatre, on the Anderson circuit, have installed a high quality film service for Sundays. The Spoor branch of the G. F. Co. at 435 North Clark street is furnishing the service for both houses.

Fenton Davis, owner of the Fenton Davis theatre, 1161 West Madison street, recently installed a complete Kinodrome service. Manager Davis is confining his entertainment to straight pictures.

A. V. Custer, manager of the Empire theatre, Marion, Ind., was a recent caller in the city and increased the quality of his service, which is being furnished by the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co. Mr. Custer was formerly "independent," but had to give up that service to escape bankruptcy. He says he is doing well with licensed film.

BIG HOUSE FOR EPHRATA, PA.

Hiram Nessinger, who recently purchased the Gempreing building on West Main street, Ephrata, Pa., is now erecting a large first-class photoplay theatre under the roof of the same building. It is expected that the house will be ready for the opening performance by the first day of the new year.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Mr. A. E. Smith, of the Vitagraph Company, started for Europe on Wednesday, Nov. 30, to make an extended tour of the East. He will combine business with pleasure in this trip, and will be gone for some time. Good luck go with him and a "bon voyage." So say we all of us.

"The Tale of Two Cities" is now in process of construction, and the Vitagraph studio staff are devoting their best energies and efforts to make this the greatest Vitagraph "Life Portrayal" of the many that have entranced the public by their vastness and impressiveness.

At the Park Row Theatre, New York City, Mr. Maurice Costello was the guest at the Vitagraph Night given on Friday evening, Nov. 25. As usual on these occasions the house was crowded, and Mr. Costello was greeted with an enthusiastic and cordial reception. Manager McClintick expressed his appreciation of Mr. Costello's appearance by presenting him with a very pretty memento of the night and its success.

For the days just preceding the holidays you will have a trio of "Life Portrayals" that will keep you until the other good issues of the holiday week. Here is "The Law and the Man," that appears on Tuesday, Dec. 13, This will fit in just right and do good. "Playing at Divorce," a domestic drama, Friday, the 16th, and on the same reel "The International Motor Boat Race," an exciting contest that has life to it, will please and entrance. "A Dixie Mother" is one of the right sort and something to admire on Saturday, Dec. 17.

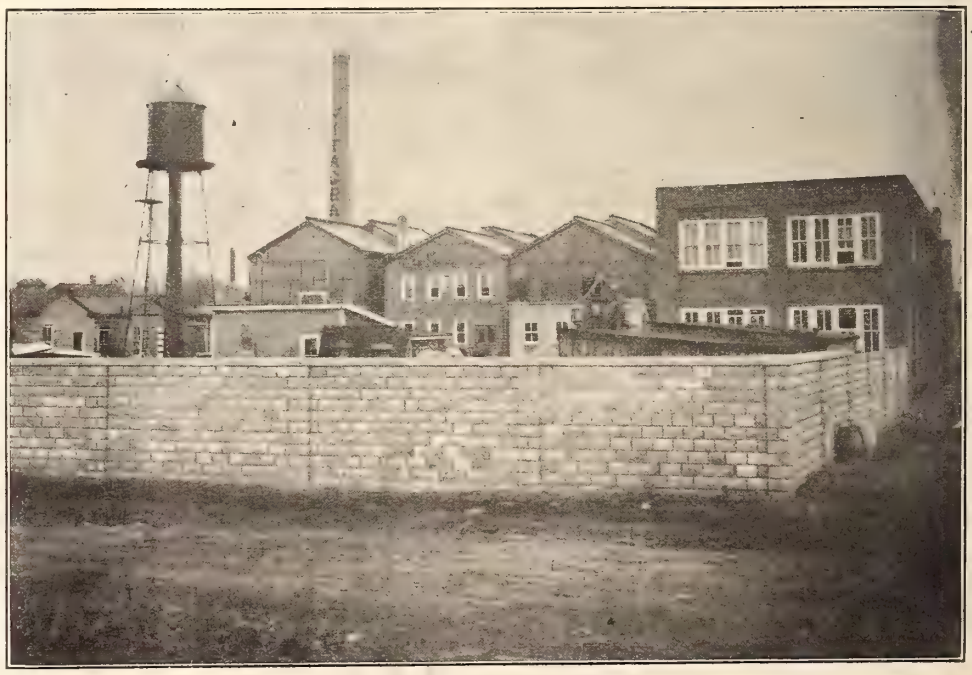
Caribou Bill, the famous Alaskan mail carrier and guide, has been engaged by the Vitagraph Company of America to take part in some wonderful pictures of the frozen North that will portray some of the thrilling experiences of the men who have opened up territories where the feet of white men have seldom tread, and have poured forth their treasures for the enrichment of mankind. They will also show the manners and customs practiced by the pioneers who were instrumental in accomplishing great deeds of courage and endurance.

The caravan of autos and necessary conveyances for the actors and properties that started from the Vitagraph studios last Sunday for the frozen North was a sight to behold. In the lead was "Caribou Bill," driving his dog team of thirteen "Huskies," hitched to a large sled on wheels, loaded with his personal kit and family. "Caribou Bill" is an Alaskan guide and mail carrier whose drove of "Husky" dogs, half wolf and half Newfoundland, have won him fame and fortune, and they will be a big feature in the Life Portrayals to be produced among the snows and mountains of the North country.

Whew! That was a cold dip. Think of taking a plunge in the Vitagraph lake right out of doors on Dec. 3. It makes you shiver to think of it. That's exactly what the three "long fellows," stripped to the skin, did last Saturday in "Soldiers Three," and they are men of courage. After a good rub down and a drink of hot tea they were as frisky as colts. Keep a watch out for "Soldiers Three," a Vitagraph comedy or one of the regular fun makers. It is as funny, if not funnier, than "Jack Fat and Jim Slim," and that's saying a great deal.

Already inquiries are made about the Vitagraph three-reel adaptation of Charles Dickens' "Tale of Two Cities." This will be the one great feature film of the year 1911; it will make a whole program and surpass in every respect all previous issues of the great Life Portrayals.

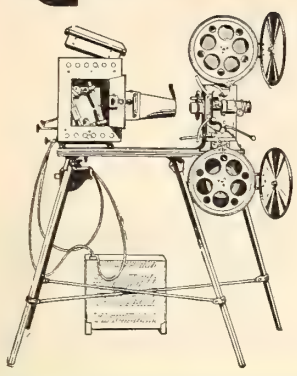
There is now two weeks before Christmas. A few suggestions for a real Merry Christmas are in order. Three of the best offers for this week are "The Law and the Man," Dec. 13; "Playing at Divorce" and "The International Motor Boat Races," both on the same reel and day, Dec. 16, and "A Dixie Mother," on Dec. 17. Vitagraph quality is the inducements.



A VIEW OF VITAGRAPHVILLE.

It is some time since a picture of the home of Vitagraph Life Portrayals has been made for publication. The one here reproduced fails to convey a proper idea of the bigness of the plant, but it shows something of the improvements that have been made in Vitagraphville during the past year. The three old studios appear at the left of the picture. The large building on the left is the new manufacturing plant where the films are developed and printed. The entire plant is surrounded by a high stone wall, which is the most conspicuous thing in this picture.

QUALITY—QUANTITY—ECONOMY



Three absolute essentials if you are to profitably conduct a Motion Picture Theatre; but they cannot be obtained from antiquated equipment. Only users of the Edengraph enjoy to the fullest measure quality of picture, quantity of projection in the least time and economy of operation.

Points of Superiority Enumerated and Described in a Handsomely Illustrated Catalogue, which will be mailed on request.

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.

Scott & Van Altena.

"ROSEBUD."—Lyric by Marvin Lee; music by Donald Bestor; published by Will Rossiter, Chicago, Ill. A sentimental song of the highest order. Illustrated with a novelty set of slides that reveal in a wonderful way the beauties of that favorite flower. Ruskin, with his pen, gave us beautiful word pictures of nature's creation; but none were so vivid, so real, or showed in such minute detail, the beautiful rose as do these slides of Scott & Van Altena.

"ALL ABOARD FOR BLANKET BAY."—Words by Andrew B. Sterling; music by Harry Von Tilzer; published by Harry Von Tilzer, New York. A slumber song with a lullaby swing that should make a hit with the feminine part of the audience. Now as for the slides—Ship ahoy!. All aboard for this set, if you want the most fascinating child set ever posed. Yes, the little one is in a sailor suit—a real admiral's uniform and "cute" only half expresses the impression he makes. He rides the seas on his "pillow ship" and he rigs the good "dreamland," and does many other interesting things that will tickle the children to death.

"DON'T YOU MIND IT, HONEY."—Words and music by Caro Romo; published by the Temple Music Co., New York. A Southern heart song of sweet melody and facinating time. The slides are on the exceedingly high order love ballad style of Scott & Van Altena. The beauties of nature are brought into play in appropriate manner, and novelties that are at once new and beautiful abound. A good set for the most particular of managers.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"THEY'VE WON EVERY NATION'S BATTLES BUT THEIR OWN."—A novelty march song by Ren Shields, John Nestor and Geo. Christie; published by M. Witmark & Son. A fine novelty song, telling how the Irish have won battles for every nation, but their own. A novelty set of slides which to be sure bespeak true Irish wit in their cleverness and originality. The Emerald Isle in all her beauty, her most distinguished sons, and their accomplishments are some of its features. The predominating color? —that which signifies "road clear" to a subway motorman.

"GET A GIRL TO LOVE YOU."—Words by Alfred Bryan; music by Albert Gumble; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co. A dainty little ballad with a catchy waltz refrain of which the sentiment will appeal to everyone. Not more so, however, than will the little model whose reproduction graces the illustrations. And not more so than do the beautiful flowers, lawns, estates that enhance her beauty by acting as background. Now, with such a model, such country, and his own skill, what results are impossible for Wheeler to obtain? None! Therefore, this set is a wonder.

"IN MY DREAMS OF YOU."—Words and music by Clare Kummer, the foremost woman song writer before the public today; writer of "Dearie" and many other hits. Published by Jerome H. Remick & Co. A clever song which is bound to be well received. Concerning the illustrations—what is more beautiful than water? What tempts the painter's brush like the fathomless sea? Sit near it by the hour and you never tire of it. It sooths and quiets the nerves. So with this set, which is posed near a lake. It sooths and pleases and its novelties bring applause. What more can be expected of a song slide?

Alfred L. Simpson.

"DON'T WAKE ME UP, I'M DREAMING."—By Herbert H. Ingraham, author of the great musical successes "Hoo, Hoo, Aint You Coming Out Tonight," "Roses Bring Dreams of You," etc. Published by Shapiro. The publisher of this song predicts for it a greater hit than any of its predecessors. This is saying a good deal. In Simpson's set of illustrations is photography of exceptional excellence and coloring of his usual artistic quality.

"COME AND SPEND CHRISTMAS WITH ME."—Words by Allan Mitchell; music by Fred. Helf; published by Helf & Hager. A dainty Holiday ballad of great merit. The story of a rich little girl who shares her Christmas tree with her poor little companion. This is a very sweet and pathetic story. Simpson has done justice to his theme in a novel set of slides. The Christmas tree and presents are shown—and taken altogether, make an attractive Holiday showing.

Levi Company, Inc.

"COME JOSEPHINE IN MY FLYING MACHINE."—Published by Shapiro. Up she goes. The tremendous popularity of this song is daily increasing the demand for the slides. It is Blanche Ring's big sensational number in the "Yankee Girl" and almost every slide singer duplicates her wonderful success, when using it. Demand the set from your Exchange.

"LET ME SPEAK THE LONGING IN MY HEART."—Lyrics by E. S. S. Huntington; music by Arthur H. Gutman; published by Seymour Furth Music Publishing Co., N. Y. Another big ballad. A clever story set to an exquisite melody. Different from the average ballad in as much as it is easy to sing. Good looking models, clever posing and beautiful coloring.

Excelsior Slide Co.

"SWEET ANNA LIZE."—Words by Bartley Costello; music by Henry I. Marshall; published by Ted Snyder. A tuneful love ballad with a fascinating movement that should appeal to lovers of this class of music. Illustrations by Excelsior are of the popular love ballad style, excellently colored, and well posed.

"DER DEUTSCHE RAG."—Words by Sam M. Lewis; music by B. O. Bennet; published by the music house of Laemmle. This is something on the lively order that goes well once in a while. The slides shows us a real German band and the riot they create. The set is humorous and entertaining.

HALLBERG EQUIPS KEITH'S FIFTH AVENUE THEATRE.

This has been in operation for the past two weeks and in connection with the "new system" has aroused the most favorable comment. THE MUSICAL RANCH

Released Thursday, December 15th. Length about 990 feet

The Musical Ranch

This is a story full of fun and with plenty of love interest as well. They certainly did like music on the Flying G Ranch. There was a Mexican who twanged the mandolin, an Indian who beat the bass drum, a Chinaman who clashed the cymbals and a colored gentleman who rattled the bones. Nora, the good-looking cook, liked music too, but unfortunately, Bob, the foreman, couldn't play. He was madly in love with Nora, and when she seemed to be charmed with the tunes of a tramp fiddler who happened along Bob grew jealous. He solved the difficulty in a novel way with the assistance of a phonograph—and won Nora, too. This is bound to be a great favorite.

The Lubin is the sure sign of success

Released Monday, December 19th. Length about 988 feet.

The Dead Letter

Two lovers have a misunderstanding, and the letter written by the girl, asking forgiveness, is lost in the mails. It is found, accidentally, 25 years later, and the lovers, older, but still constant toward each other, are united. The nephew and niece, respectively, of the man and woman are also in love and the wedding bells ring for them at the same time. A story of absorbing interest throughout and with a doubly happy ending.

THE BABY BREADWINNERS—A GAUMONT NOVELTY

Two Tiny Tads Are the Principals in a Picture of Surpassing Interest and Beauty

By James S. McQuade

GAUMONT has offered picture lovers, in "The Baby Breadwinners," a novelty drama that promises to impress everyone who sees it, by the bold originality and realism of the story. French in its atmosphere, it goes even beyond our American proclivities for money making, as children scarcely in their teens are seen leaving their home by stealth and going out into the big world to seek employment and fortune.

The camera men have done excellent work in the taking of the negative, and the producer has carefully avoided the introduction of details or incidents that might tend to divert attention from the direct, simple story and its ultimate end. The two children and their exploits are always in the foreground, and from the time that they steal out of the attic window of their home in the early morning, until the gendarmes bring them back to their parents they dominate the scenes and rivet attention.

PLOWING.

The photography is singularly clear and soft and seeing that the 686 feet of film have been negatived out-of-doors an exceptionally fitting day must have been chosen for the work. The scenes showing the little boy and his tiny sister trudging along the highway, with their bundles dangling at the end of sticks across their shoulders, and the pretty glimpses of landscape in the vicinity are most enjoyable. And the ploughing scene, where the boy holds the plough while his sister guides the oxen by means of the long pole fixed in their yoke, is full of comical realism. So also is the threshing scene in the barnyard, where the two mites are seen threshing the grain with old-fashioned flails, with all the earnestness and vim of their elders.

SOWING.

Nor must the easy, natural acting of these children be overlooked. It is so exactly like what one would expect children to appear and do under the circumstances that the fact that they are acting might be overlooked by many. Indeed, the children beat their elder associates in the matter of acting, although the rural characters are all capitally sustained. I would also draw attention to the realism of the opening scene, showing the children's home, in which geese, fowl, lambs and sheep are seen coming in and out of the camera's field, while they move about as the inclination seizes them.

The children are the offspring of poor French people who toil daily on their farm, not being able to afford the hiring of help. It is morning—just before the father and mother go into the fields to dig and rake and hoe—when we first catch sight of the two tots. They are seated at a table in front of the farm house and their childish faces look full of plot and resolution. They have just hatched a great scheme and outlined a plan of action.

THRESHING.

The mother and father come out of the farm house and speak to the children affectionately before leaving for their toil, but each discontented mite turns the face away and has no kind word or look for father or mother. Again do the parents seek a smile or word of goodbye, and again are they repelled by averted faces and silence. They smile a knowing smile at each other, shoulder their farming tools, and go off to work.

No sooner are the youngsters left alone than their dispositions are changed. They talk hurriedly between smiles, jump from their seats, and hastily enter the farm house. Then the camera man shows us that they are making preparations for departure. Articles of apparel and food for the journey are packed into two tiny bundles and these are hidden away, all ready for use the following morning, when father and mother are lying deep in slumber.

THEIR FORTUNE.

Next we witness the entrance of the young people into the great world of freedom and action. The boy appears first and climbs through the window, after which he assists his little sister to the ground. The bundles are shouldered and the march into the unknown is begun. They walk bravely and unregretfully along the

CASUAL COMMENT

IMPORTANT to all motion picture exhibitors is the effort now being made to establish a parcels post in the United States. Elsewhere in this issue will be found a communication on the subject from Mr. J. H. Hallberg, who has given the matter some attention and indicates that a great saving will be effected thereby.

Men engaged in the motion picture business have no occasion to favor the express companies. If anyone has a reason to wish for the end of their tyrannical monopoly it is the picture man. Mr. Hallberg has suggested a way in which the picture man can help along the movement for a parcels post. It is proposed that exhibitors shall run announcement slides in their houses nightly for the purpose of interesting the public in the movement. The display of such slides in 10,000 picture theatres should surely serve to start something in the parcels post line.

THIS is a matter of sufficient importance to give immediate and serious attention. There is a bill before Congress just now that has for its purpose the establishment of the parcels post. It was introduced by Congressman William Sulzer of New York and has been endorsed by an association of business men organized to boost the plan. The bill is mentioned by Mr. Hallberg in his communication. Now, there is need of the service; there are the theatres in which announcements may be run. Who will furnish the slides? Here is a chance for some of the song-slide men to show their interest in the cause. A few lettered announcements are what is wanted; just a line urging the public to write to the congressmen to support the Sulzer bill.

In the meantime, while the song-slide men are thinking the matter over, we would suggest that every exhibitor should get up a few home-made slides. One reading something like this would make a good beginning:

"WRITE YOUR CONGRESSMAN TO SUPPORT
SULZER'S PARCELS POST BILL.
DO IT TODAY."

Or one like this might set some of your patrons to thinking:

"A PARCELS POST WILL REDUCE THE HIGH COST OF LIVING.
ASK YOUR CONGRESSMAN TO SUPPORT IT. DO IT NOW."

Undoubtedly you have a few ideas of your own. Do something anyway, if the thing should go through you would find that the cost of shipping your reels would be considerably less.

Why not try it?

SPEAKING of the parcels post, an example of its working was brought to our notice by E. H. Montagu of Pathe Freres, who has just received a ten-pound English plum pudding from London, which cost for transmission through the mail by parcels post but $1.08. What do you know about that? If you lived in England you could send a ten-pound package to any part of the United States for $1.08. But as you are a resident of the United States you must send it by some express at several times that cost. Nice state of affairs, isn't it?

ONE can never tell how one's efforts are going to take. After you had smote the enemy hip and thigh, and, to your own satisfaction, put him on the toboggan, wouldn't it jar you to get a letter like this from one of your ardent admirers:

There was a time when the writer looked forward with pleasure to reading the editorial page of your excellent paper; but I notice for the past four or five weeks, more or less, that you have given over the entire space devoted to "casual comment" to an arraignment of The Moving Picture World. Personally, I never saw a copy of The Moving Picture World, that is to say the inside of one. I have seen plenty of them, but have never taken the trouble to look at them, and I suppose there are thousands more of your readers the same as myself. I have no doubt that The Moving Picture World is not nearly so good a paper as The Film Index; but don't you think that it is pretty near time you let up on it? In your "casual comment" you used to publish items of interest to managers and exhibitors, but as for now, I think it is "rot." Of course, I know you don't care much what I say about this and I have no hopes of making you change your policy, but I consider it very undignified. One editorial a week, I think, would be quite sufficient on this subject. I notice in the number of Dec. 17 you have six about your "distinguished contemporary." Once you tried to give us a little news or something of interest to somebody else besides your own staff in this column.

What can a poor man do in a case like this? Guess we will have to quit joshing our esteemed contemporary and return to our job of interesting our readers.

BEFORE we get back on the job, however, we must ask our correspondent's pardon while we take one last fling at the Philistines. Sorry that he does not read the M. P. World, since he would then the better appreciate our bon mots. From his letter we are certain that he is a man of more than average education, therefore, we ask him to translate for us, if he can, this alleged French phrase:

"Tres petites pommes des terres."

The writer of the above quotation has offered to translate it for us, but after his "j'ai mal de tete" our faith in his ability to do so is some shaky. Just to give our correspondent a line on the phrase we would explain that it means something which he thinks Edison is.

To explain to our correspondent, who, by the way, is Mr. A. L. Lazarus, assistant manager of Loew's Orpheum theatre, Boston, Mass., we would say that it is our fervent hope that we may be able to cure the editor of our esteemed contemporary of his pernicious practice of trying to quote French, and hope that he will appreciate the humor of the situation. But, as Bill Selig would say, "Was man kann nicht meiden, muss man willig leiden," or, what can't be cured must be endured.

THE subject of bulletins seems, just now, to be the most important one before the house. From a sheet or booklet intended to inform the exhibitor of the character of pictures to be released, the bulletin has evoluted to a sort of poster for the information of the public and posted upon the outer walls by the exhibitor. Now, as is well known, some of the bulletins published do not lend themselves kindly to this treatment. Others serve the purpose in an indifferent way. Some of the manufacturers have recognized the demand and have designed descriptive bulletins better suited to the uses of the theatre manager than others. Yet, there is still room for improvement.

From a letter written to The Film Index by an exhibitor we are led to understand that what is wanted is a series of uniform bulletins for all releases which may be placed in a permanent frame to be placed in the theatre lobby. This idea has our approval. It is in line with an idea of our own on the subject of bulletins, which we hope to see adopted. Rome was not built in a day; so, in time the manufacturers will arrive at the form of bulletin that is best suited for their needs and those of the exhibitor. They are trying out different ideas and from them the best will be agreed upon. The matter is in the brew and something will come out soon.

TURNS MARKET INTO PICTURE ROOM

The motion picture business has become so profitable an enterprise in Brownsville a large part of the Ames street market building, corner of Pitkin avenue, Brooklyn, is being refitted for a first-class motion picture and vaudeville show. The market building was erected less than three years ago at a large cost, but soon after its opening it was discovered the market business along Pitkin avenue was not as expected.

Benjamin Mindlin, treasurer of the New Liberty theatre, has leased the larger part of the building and is refitting it for a motion picture theatre. Mindlin has arranged with the Brownsville Relief Society to give it the entire proceeds of the opening night, which will be the latter part of the month.

MORE IMPROVEMENTS AT DREAMLAND

The management of Dreamland photoplay theatre, Pueblo, Col., has just completed some very extensive improvements in the way of decorations. They have also installed a most up-to-date machine to be had, making it impossible for a breakdown or delay in making changes from one picture to another. The pictures are free from flicker and will not hurt the eyes, no matter what section of the house you may be seated in.

The pictures are on the curtain continuously from 10 a. m. until 11 p. m. No stops or intermissions. The idea has been carried out successfully in the Eastern houses and appeals to the public for reason the picture is on the curtain any time you may enter the house.

THE BABY BREADWINNERS

highway, until crossroads are encountered and then looks of bewilderment cloud their faces. The boy hastily recovers his confidence and chooses the direction, his sister following him without word or hesitation. Thus they continue their wanderings until a farm house is reached. The farmer is brought to the door by the boy's knocking and questions them. "We want work" is the response, and we see the farmer's lusty sides shake with laughter as he eyes the pigmy hired man and woman.

But the boy is brave and will not be put off. He slaps the brawny muscles of his arm, to the great amusement of the good natured farmer, and by his demeanor shows that he is boosting himself and sister as thoroughly capable of "making good," either in field or barn. The farmer calls his wife to the scene and both enjoy the novelty of the incident so much that they laugh unrestrainedly and end it by engaging both children.

Early the following morning, with all traces of their journey worn off by refreshing sleep, the children, the farmer and his wife, and a yoke of oxen attached to a plough are viewed in the barnyard. Everything is in readiness for the youngsters to show their worth as ploughboy and ox leader. The girl fastens her guide pole in its place in the harness, while the boy fastens a small bag containing refreshments to a handle of the plough. They proceed to the field, as the farmer and his wife watch them with surprised delight.

Now maybe you think that the youngster can't plow. Just watch him. True, he is small and light and the heavy implement, as it meets tenacious obstacles in the rich soil, sometimes lifts him from his feet and sways him from side to side; but he succeeds in keeping the ploughshare buried deep, and turns furrow after furrow with the skill of an expert. At the turnings at the ends of the field the children manage the team and plough with really wonderful cleverness, the little chap especially, manipulating the heavy implement with an unusual display of strength.

The heavy work, however, tells and the lad stops his team amid field, mops his brow, and helps his sister and himself to a draught of red wine (or water. Who knows?). He is a kindhearted little fellow, too, as well as a manful; for we see him pat the oxen during the rest, knowing that they also are weary.

The parents of the runaways, in the meantime, have been scouring the country far and wide for them, and the gendarmes, or police, have been instructed to find them. And so, one day, while the youthful workers are threshing in the barnyard they are taken in charge by two gendarmes and conducted home; not, however, before they have been well paid for their services by the farmer who employed them, and affectionately caressed by his good wife.

The reunion with their parents forms the closing scene, and both children seem glad to be home again. Proudly the boy brings forth the bag containing the money earned by himself and sister, and as he counts the coins his father and mother as proudly look on.

As we leave them let us hope that the little boys and girls who see this beautiful and interesting film are not discontented with their homes; and let us hope also that, if they are they may meet with as kind and warm friends and with as great success should they become runaways, and that they shall also return home to make up for the lack of respect and affection shown their good fathers and mothers during the days of their discontent.

IN THE TALL GRASS COUNTRY

Excellent Drama Produced by the Melies Stock Company in Texas

JEALOUSY is one of the most harmful of human passions. It often terminates relations that have been sweet and tender and parts for life those who might have lived together in the sublimest accord. Philosophers say that a jealous person becomes either haughty or revengeful; that they become prejudiced without sufficient proof of guilt on the part of the victim of their haughtiness.

Such a phase of human nature is set forth dramatically in Melies coming release, "In the Tall Grass Country." Bob and Nell are in love. Nell is a well-to-do ranchman's daughter; Bob an easterner gone to the west to seek a fortune raising cattle. He calls daily to see his intended and many and sweet are the tete-a-tetes of this happy young couple. So fond do they become of one another that they no longer desire to see anyone else.

Even though her suspicions had been rather vague at first, she was more than ever sure of his faithlessness when she spied Bob driving Helen, whom she supposed was his new flame, to his ranch.

One day, after she had not seen Bob for some time, a forest fire broke out and Nell viewed it with field glasses, the better to see its detail. While searching with her eyes, she spied Helen, Bob's sister, who had wandered far into the woods and was trapped by the forest fire. Instantly a debate arose in her mind whether to have revenge by allowing Helen to be burned to death, or to let the nobler part of her nature have sway and rescue the entrapped girl. She does the latter—leads Helen from the buring forest, but in doing so is overcome herself and falls prostrate by a stream. Bob and the boys hurry to rescue

SCENE FROM MELIES SUBJECT "IN THE TALL GRASS COUNTRY."

The story hangs on a letter received by Bob from his sister, Helen, notifying him that she would pay a visit to his ranch and is signed "With love, Helen." In going back to his cabin, Bob drops this letter and it is picked up by the village gossip, who straightway rushes to Nell and induces her to believe that Bob is deceiving her—that he is paying attention to another woman.

Naturally Nell is downhearted. The only man she has ever put faith in has apparently turned traitor to his vow. In the words of the philosopher, she became "haughty," and thereafter disdained Bob's presence.

Helen, whom they find out of danger and on her way home. She informs them that a girl whose description corresponds to that of Nell had rescued her life. The boys are off again and it is Bob who finds Nell lying by the stream. Back to the camp they carry her and when Nell is revived the same haughtiness fills her being. Bob is quick to see the reason for her attitude and makes things straight by introducing to her his sister Helen. Naturally Nell is embarrassed, but makes the best of the situation by falling into Bob's arms and declaring everlasting love. A satisfying conclusion to a thrilling story.

APPEAL TO THE PHOTOPLAY WORLD.

Help Pass Congressman Sulzer's Parcels Post Bill, Now Before Congress

The yoke put upon every user of merchandise in this country by the express companies has now been carried to the limit. Not only is the cost of express service excessive and almost prohibitive in many instances, but the discourteous treatment, especially in the larger cities, by the employees of the express companies, as well as the arbitrary rulings by the officers of these corporations have gone the last degree, and it is now up to everybody to write to his representative at Washington to do his utmost to have the present Congress give immediate attention to the parcels post bill, which has been introduced by Congressman Sulzer of New York.

The express companies have enjoyed complete monopoly where shipments of parcels weighing more than four pounds, and the rates established by them are absolutely arbitrary in most instances, not being figured, or based upon the cost of service rendered, but put to a point as high as possible, and just below the present parcel post rate for packages under four pounds, making it impossible for a shipper to use any other service.

The main difficulty from the people's point of view, is that our government postal service increased the parcels post rate many years ago from 8 cents to 16 cents per pound for interstate business, notwithstanding the fact that our post office will handle parcels coming from Europe at rates of one-half or less than is charged for interstate business. Just why our postal rate is so much higher than that of other countries and especially why it is higher for the service to an American citizen than for a foreigner mailing a parcel in Europe for delivery in this country, is difficult to understand, and Congressman Sulzer on the strength of these facts has introduced the bill above mentioned, which cuts the price to 8 cents per pound, and has gone further by increasing the limit to 11 pounds per package, instead of the previous four pound limit.

It is easy to understand, and anyone can figure for himself, what this bill means to the express companies. In a few words, it means the breaking of their complete monopoly on all shipments of eleven pounds and less in weight. It will allow an exhibitor to get his film service in any city in the United States, at the same price, irrespective of the locality of his film exchange, giving him an opportunity to select the exchange where he knows he will get the best treatment and the best service.

This reduction in cost of transporting and delivering merchandise will enable anyone to buy goods in any part of the country at the lowest market price without being taxed with an arbitrary and excessive transportation charge which practically blocks choice of market for the purchaser under the present conditions. I don't believe that Congressman Sulzer's parcels post bill can be considered too strongly by anyone. It will be the means of equalizing market prices for any kind of small goods all over the country. The man in San Francisco can purchase goods in New York City and have them deivered on his premises at the same price as can a man in Buffalo, or in any other part of the United States.

The cost of transporting an eleven pound package from New York to San Francisco by parcels post under the new system would be only 88 cents, whereas under the present conditions the price would be more than twice this amount, and this extra toll or charge by the express companies at the present time may double the cost of goods purchased in certain out-of-the-way markets, making it absolutely prohibitive and giving some local dealer a small monopoly on the sale of certain goods.

I appeal particularly to Photoplay Exhibitors to help the passage of the Sulzer bill, and suggest that slides be exhibited on the screen in every theatre in the United States, urging the patrons to write to their representative at Washington to have the Sulzer parcels post bill passed.

The bill is in Congress at Washington—The movement is on—The ball is rolling—Do your part to make it a success! The eleven pound 8 cents per pound parcels post system will cheapen many of your commodities. It will equalize prices, and we are sure enrich our government, and will sooner or later be the means of reducing the cost of our sealed letter postage, and will immediately effect a great saving on the transportation of small parcels, and last, but not least, will give to the government some of the millions which are now going into the coffers of the express companies, and as far as the service is concerned, you will all agree how much more dignified the United States postal service is, as compared with the present express service.

Get busy now. A few slides projected on your screen will do the trick, and show the managers of our political affairs (Congress) in Washington that the good influence of the photoplay theatre amounts to a great deal more than anyone has ever thought of.

CLUNE'S NEW BROADWAY THEATRE

Los Angeles has become quite noted for the excellence of its motion picture theatres. There are several very fine houses in that city devoted exclusively to pictures. Notable among these is the New Broadway, recently built by Mr. W. H. Clune, one of the motion picture magnates of the Pacific Coast.

Mr. Clune has some very excellent ideas regarding the exhibition of motion pictures and the proper construction of theatres for that purpose. He has endeavored to carry out these ideas in the construction of his newest house, the "New Broadway." The capacity of this theatre is about 900. It is sumptuously furnished and equipped with the very best of everything pertaining to a modern theatre. There is a large orchestra to supply the incidental music and interludes; two vocalists are employed to afford variety to the program; lady ushers attend to the patrons and an air of refinement pervades the house. Among the people who patronize the New Broadway are to be found the very best in Los Angeles. The prices range from 10 to 15 cents for orchestra chairs and 20 cents for seats in the loges.

The cost of this theatre complete was $50,000. One very attractive feature of this house is the great electric sign, a most artistic affair which tops off the facade. This sign is of original and artistic design, and was built by Mr. Clune at a cost of $3,500. It is said to be the finest electrical sign in Los Angeles.

Mr. Clune operates another high-class house in Los Angeles and is building a new theatre in Pasadena, Cal., for exclusive pictures, at a cost of $60,000. This house will be ready for occupancy in January. Mr. Clune also operates Clune's Film Exchange, serving licensed pictures to a large number of picture theatres on the coast.

A motion picture theatre is to be built on the east side of Front street, north of Ontario street, Philadelphia, Pa., for George W. Chapman by John H. Robinson. It will measure 32 by 70 feet and cost $2,000. It will be one story high.

John Thompson has opened a photoplay theatre at Pierce's Opera House, Duluth, Minn.

The new Ward Theatre, Lockport, Ill., which opened Saturday evening, Nov. 19, attracted many people. A musical programme was given and the event made it pleasant for everyone. The pictures shown were excellent and the attraction was well enjoyed.

THE JOKE ON BUMPTIOUS

Edison Players Produce Fine Comedy With This Favorite Character

IT is some time since the Edison players have given us any of the exploits of that now famous comedy character "Bumptious." But two good examples of his fun-making efforts are about to be released. One, in fact, is due this week, and the other will come later. The first is "The Joke They Played on Bumptious," and shows how a merry group of fun-loving clubmen overreached themselves in their efforts to perpetrate a practical joke on the easy mark.

The fun starts at a little dinner when Bumptious is introduced to the seductive cocktail. Afterward the boys invite him to their club where they induce him to drink numerous glasses of ginger ale, supposing it to be more cocktails. After having apparently filled Bumptious to the guards with strong drink, the boys set about to impress upon him the fact that he is intoxicated. They succeed so well that Bumptious is soon seeing double and triple; apparently as full as a goat.

By this time the steward of the club, feeling that the game has gone far enough, tips Bumptious off to the joke that has been played upon him. Instead of quitting there and taking the laugh, Bumptious decides to play the game to the limit. Getting hold of a fire-shovel, he commences to put the place out of business and smashes the chandelier in his efforts. Intervention prevents further damage, except to the feelings of the practical jokers who are called upon to pay for the damage done by their guest.

The comedy of the picture is good and it is one of the best that Bumptious has yet appeared in.

BIG PHOTOPLAY THEATRE FOR ALGIERS

A Number of New Orleans Men Interested in the Enterprise—House Will Cost $25,000

A $25,000 structure is the newest project for Algiers, La., which when completed will be operated as a motion picture and vaudeville theatre. This information was gleaned from an official sources last week, and it is understood that a number of prominent people of New Orleans are interested, including Mr. Philip Foto, proprietor of the Market theatre, the motion picture and vaudeville house which he recently established and which is meeting with splendid success.

The promoters of the idea have already secured an option on a desirable number of lots, centrally located, and it is expected that the deal for the property will be closed in a few days. It has not yet been decided just what sort of a building will be erected, but one of sufficient size to allow the seating of 1,200 persons is desired. Whether brick or timber will be used remains to be decided. It is the intention of the promoters to put up a thoroughly modern and up-to-date theatre, with all the conveniences and accommodations required.

PHOTOPLAY THEATRES CAN BUILD ANYWHERE.

According to an action of the license committee of the Common Council of Newark, N. J., motion picture theatres will be allowed to exhibit within 200 feet of a church. This action rescinds a motion made and adopted by the committee some months ago in the case of an application for a motion picture show license in the Roselle section of the city.

This application was denied on the grounds that the proposed house would build within the 200 feet limit. At the last meeting of the Common Council it was argued that there was nothing to stop any person from building a picture house anywhere in the city.

ASHTON & BALL GET ANOTHER HOUSE.

By a deal which was closed Nov. 20 with the trustees of the Luna Theatre, the control of the Luna photoplay house of Salt Lake City, Utah, passes into the hands of the Ashton & Ball Theatre Company, which has already acquired the Isis. This company also controls similar houses at Provo, American Fork, Beaver, Spanish Fork and Mt. Pleasant. Edward Holland, a New York lecturer, will be at the Luna, while the Sperry Sisters will form a part of the entertainment offered at the Isis.

BELIEVES IN MOTION PICTURES.

Dr. M. E. White, superintendent of the county insane asylum, Milwaukee, Wis., believes that the proper use of motion pictures can be made an effective aid in curing the mentally weak. The maniac who is habitually shown certain styles of motion pictures can be affected as though by hypnotism. The motion pictures will suggest mental processes to the maniac, who can gradually be led to use his mind in a manner that will relieve the diseased cells, and thus eventually result in a cure. Dr. White, however, calls attention to the fact that just as surely the incorrect picture will result disastrously to the patient.

MOTOR CAR COMEDY

The "Horseless Carriage" Craze Furnishes Subject for Good Work By Pathe Players

AMONG the comedy subjects offered for early release is the "Runaway Motor Car," from the American studio of Pathe Freres. This pictures belongs to the better class of farce comedy and has a novelty feature in the way of a little trick photography.

The story is that of a young man who has automobile on the brain. His malady is intensified by a letter from a rich uncle promising to send him a "horseless carriage." In his enthusiasm of expectancy he builds a garage and spends much of his time on automobile row. At night he dreams of nothing but speeding in his fine motor car, which dream ends in an encounter with a policeman, when he wakes up to discover it was his bed that fell down.

On the following day he persuades a friend who has a car to let him run it. The young man knows absolutely nothing about running a car, and his career is exceedingly erratic. In protest against the inexperienced chauffeur the automobile finally comes to an abrupt standstill. The young man gets out to examine the car when there is a terrific explosion and everything goes skyward. We see sections of the car and man sailing through the atmosphere in rapid flight; then we are shown crowds of people following the course of the fragments, watching them with excited interest.

The young man finally lands on terra firma in a somewhat dilapidated condition to be picked up and helped home by his friends. On arriving at his home he is properly bandaged up. After a few weeks convalescence he is advised by Bridget that the "horseless carriage" is in the garage. He hobbles out to look the machine over. What he finds is the big laugh of the picture and we leave it for you to discover.

INDIANAPOLIS OPERATORS MUST BE LICENSED.

Unless the photoplay operators in Indianapolis, Ind., get licenses from William Kost, city license inspector, they will have to submit to arrest. Before the operators can obtain a license they must pass an examination given by the building inspector; after they pass such an examination they must pay a yearly fee of $5. There are seventy picture houses in Indianapolis and $350 coming from operators into the city treasury is not being overlooked by the city officials.

BAD FOCUS.

Portsmouth, Ohio, writes that he is having trouble with his pictures, to get them in focus. One side is sharp and the other side is out of focus. Is using an Edison machine and the picture jumps up and down. The tension springs appear to be all right. Is working 60 feet from screen and would like to know the proper way to set condensers. Is using one 6½-inch focus and one 7½-inch focus. Some say the 7½-inch focus goes towards the light and some say the 6½-inch focus goes towards the light. Which is the correct way to set the condensers?

Answer—As to the picture being out of focus on one side it might be that you are working on an angle. If so, that would put one side of your picture out of focus; that is, one side would be larger than the other. The best way to remedy this is to put your screen on the same angle as your machine, by that I mean to move the side of the screen nearest to you out a little, so that your screen will be on the same angle with your machine and at the same time you will find that this will remedy the picture, being small on one side and large on the other. It will give you the same results as if you were working directly in the center of the house. Also, you might have a little oil on your lens, or your lens might not be setting in your machine properly, which would have a tendency to put your picture out on one side; or it might be that your aperture plate, or your tension springs are worn to such an extent that your film does not travel evenly as it should; that is, the film does not bear squarely on the tracks of the aperture plate which would cause your film to be out a little as it passes the aperture. I would suggest a new aperture plate and a new pair of tension springs. It might be that your lens is not in line with your condensers and that the light does not strike the center of the lens as it should, which would blur your picture on one side. If your tension springs are too loose, or your aperture plate is worn, this would have a tendency to make your picture jump at times. Or it might be possible that you have lost motion in the star and cam which would cause the film to jump up and down. If so, loosen the set screws in frame of machine and adjust the eccentric bushing so as to eliminate the lost motion and at the same time keeping the two shafts (star and cam) exactly parallel to each other. The condenser to use nearest the light at the distance you are working from is 6½-inch focus, and the 7½-inch focus towards the screen.

SETTING SHUTTER.

I am frequently asked for instructions in regard to setting the exterior revolving shutter on Power's No. 6. So, in order to more clearly show the proper position of the shutter in relation to the movement of the intermittent sprocket, I show two photographs illustrating same. One of the three wings is wider than either of the other two, which are the same size. The wide wing is indicated by the company's name stamped on the blade. This is the active element of the shutter which intercepts the light when the film is in movement.

Fig. 1 shows the position of the shutter covering slightly more than half the lens at the moment when the intermittent sprocket just begins to move the film down.

Fig. 2 shows the shutter covering about the same percentage of the lens when the intermittent movement stops and the film comes to rest.

If there is any difference whatever between the amount of the aperture exposed at the beginning and at the end of the movement, it should be in favor of the end of the movement. That is to say, more of the aperture or lens should be covered at the end of the movement than at the beginning. If this rule is carefully followed and a slight travel ghost appears, move the shutter in the direction taken by the white streaks. If in a title, for instance, the white streaks appear above the letters, move the shutter slightly up in the direction of rotation. If the white streaks appear at the bottom of the letters or objects, move the shutter down against the direction of rotation.

If the cuts are carefully observed and the shutter set as shown, it should produce a perfect, clean-cut picture.

FILM TROUBLE.

H. J., Massillon, Ohio, writes—Can you please tell me in the question lists in The Film Index the following questions: I have a Power's No. 5 machine and of late the film rocks sideways, that is from one side to the other. Can you tell me the cause of this? I think it is in the face plate as the plate is worn quite a little. I have new tension springs and they are set perfectly.

Answer—The cause of the film moving sideways (from one side to the other) is due to the lost motion in your eccentric bushing. To eliminate this you loosen the set screws holding the eccentric bushings and move the bushings in towards the sprocket and then tighten the set screws again. If this does not help you try a new pair of eccentric bushings. The aperture plate being worn on one side would not effect the picture so much as to the rocking sideways, but I would recommend the putting in of a new aperture plate when they commence to wear, as a perfect aperture plate and tension springs are very essential if you want to get a perfect show. Once they commence to wear they have a tendency to cause your film to jump up and down on the screen and also get out of focus at times.

SPROCKETS.

E. W. D., Lockhaven, Pa., asks how to set the intermittent sprocket on the Power's No. 6 machine and how to tighten the gears as he has considerable lost motion.

Answer—To eliminate the lost motion (that is, the side movement, which I take it that you mean) you will find on the intermittent spindle, on the left-hand side just next to the sprocket, a small set collar. If you will loosen the set screw in this collar and bring it towards your intermittent sprocket and then tighten the set screw, you will find that this will eliminate your lost motion as far as the side motion is concerned. I do not quite follow you when you say you have considerable lost motion in the gears. Would like to hear further from you on this subject. However, should you find lost motion in the shutter spindle gear, you will find two set collars on either side of casting just where the exterior shutter is attached and by loosening these set collars and pulling the spindle out a trifle and then bringing the set collars up close to the casting and tightening same, you will find that this will eliminate your lost motion there.

NEW HOUSE FOR CLEVELAND, O.

A handsome new theatre with a large seating capacity is projected for the corner of St. Clair avenue and East 105th street, Cleveland, O. It is stated that the lease of the lot has been made and that plans for the building are nearly completed. A well known amusement concern of the city is back of the enterprise and it is claimed the house will be one of the largest and best devoted to motion pictures.

NEW KALEM HACIENDA

Verdugo Canon Will Be Scene of Operations In California

WILLIAM "Bilkalem" Wright has just returned from Los Angeles, Cal., where he spent three weeks securing a location and arranging for the operations of the Kalem stock company in California. While there Mr. Wright negotiated a lease for a tract of land in the famous Verdugo Canon and arranged for the construction of such buildings as will be needed in the production of pictures. The location is about nine miles from Los Angeles and near the village of Glendale, at which latter place the Kalem players will make their headquarters.

Verdugo Canon is noted for its natural scenic beauties and will supply every possible topographical effect needed for the Kalem historical Indian subjects. In the near distance is Mt. Lowe, where is situated the famous Lick Observatory, and Mt. Wilson, which towers 7,000 feet above the plain, is also nearby. Canons, mountains, rolling hills and flatlands, streams and forests abound on every hand. The climate is ideal. The days are warm and at night an overcoat is not uncomfortable at this time of year.

SCENE IN VERDUGO PARK, NEAR KALEM CABIN.

Historical Indian subjects will be the principal product of the Kalem California company. The players left New York about a week ago and are busy by this time. Mr. Keanan Buel is the producer in charge; Miss Alice Joyce is the leading woman. Among the members of the company are Mr. George Melford, Mrs. Melford and Master Judson Melford, and Frank Lanning, who is considered to be one of the best interpreters of Indian character parts. A number of expert cowboy riders were engaged by Mr. Wright, together with horses and the most approved equipment.

Among the buildings erected for the use of the company are block houses, a log cabin, a log church and an old trading post. All these structures are as nearly historically correct as it is possible to make them, although Mr. Wright found that getting logs in California was not an easy task. With this complete equipment and the excellent atmospheric conditions of Southern California some fine Kalem pictures may be looked forward to.

The accompanying engravings show some of the beauties of the scenery in Verdugo Canon.

BELIEVES IN SUNDAY PICTURES AND BASEBALL.

At a meeting of the National Methodist Conference, held in Chicago last week, the Rev. Dr. Edward A. Peterson, superintendent of the Goodrich House, Cleveland, O., asked for the repealing of the Sunday laws forbidding the playing of baseball and running of motion picture shows. In his address he declared that as Sunday was the working man's day he should have recreation that should go to develop the body as well as the mind.

Dr. Peterson does not believe in professional ball being played on Sunday, as he claims that it causes professional players to work. His motive for favoring the running of motion pictures, is that they are the recreation of the working girls and their mothers. By allowing these recreations Dr. Peterson does not believe in the elimination of church services, but is rather inclined to believe that if the working man can have some wholesome recreation during the Sabbath day he will feel more inclined to attend church service in the evening.

Regardless of the attack made on him by his colleagues, as to his blunt speech, the doctor seems to stand firm to his convictions.

WOLKNER NOW OWNS FAR ROCKAWAY HOUSE.

The Idle Hour photoplay theatre, Far Rockaway, N. Y., formerly owned by Messrs. Williams & Wolkner, is now entirely owned by Mr. Wolkner, who bought his partner's share last week. The house is one of the largest in the state, seating 3,500 persons. In the winter the house is well lighted and heated. In the summer the roof is taken off and the house turned into an airdome. Before the spring comes again Mr. Wolkner will make extensive repairs.

CHICAGO LETTER

By James S McQuade

THE Edison "Red Cross Seal" film, manufactured by the Edison Company, in cooperation with the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, and with the National Red Cross Society of America, is creating a well deserved interest among the various state and city health departments throughout the country. Not only this: prominent people of many cities who are engaged in philanthropic, reformative and hygienic problems among the poorer residents and in disease infested districts, are rallying to the support of this splendid motographic object lesson which is destined to furnish splendid aid in the war against the "white plague."

It is due to the untiring efforts of Mr. John Hardin, the western manager of the Edison company, that the "Red Cross Seal" has been brought to the notice of the press tubercular experts, civic officials, and philanthropic and social reform workers in Chicago and Milwaukee recently. Foreseeing the tremendous influence that can be realized by this film in motion picture theatres, if its importance is heralded and indorsed by the health departments and the proper officials of the cities, towns and villages in which it will be exhibited, Mr. Hardin arranged for private exhibitions before invited professional audiences in Milwaukee and Chicago.

Thomas Saxe, general manager and principal owner of the Saxe enterprises in Milwaukee, was approached and courteously placed his fine theatre, the Princess, at Mr. Hardin's disposal for a private presentation of the film. And this courtesy was further supplemented by the valuable services of Frank T. Cook, booking manager and publicity promoter of the Saxe theatres, who sent out invitations to the press, the members of the health department and of the Anti-Tuberculosis Society, to Mayor Seidel and other prominent citizens. As will be shown, the Milwaukee private exhibition was a great success.

The exhibition was given Wednesday, Dec. 7, and among those present were: Mayor Seidel, Health Commissioner Kraft, Carl Sandburg, Secretary to the Mayor, John Kopmeier, William George Bruce, Rabbi Samuel Hirshberg, Rev. H. H. Jacobs, Mr. Rubinovitz of the Hebrew Relief Society, Dr. Dearholt, secretary in charge of the distribution of Red Cross Seal stamps in the State of Wisconsin; Mrs. Alice Merry, director of the Lapham Park playground, Mrs. J. P. Sherer, Mrs. Eugene F. Friend, Mrs. H. E. Coblentz, Mrs. E. P. Sherry, Miss Mabel Tompkins and others enrolled in the fight against tuberculosis.

The main feature of the speeches made was to the effect that the motion picture theatre has the power to reach people—especially people amid forbidding sanitary surroundings—more effectively than any other agent; and that the lesson taught by the picture was many times more convincing and the effects more lasting than could be accomplished by lectures, advice, or any other known means.

Mayor Seidel, who was enthusiastic over the "Red Cross Seal" film, said:

"I want to say that the very first thought that came to me after viewing these scenes of conditions in tubercular infested homes, was that the city needs more money for the work that it ought to do. And we can get the necessary money, if we can get the co-operation of men and women of the city of Milwaukee.

"There is no reason why taxation should be a hardship on anyone, and I hope that this film will do something to show the people of Milwaukee that they have a responsibility which cannot be taken care of until the city gets money to do the work with. As for the film, I really cannot speak of it. I am rather ashamed, just this minute, because I am so soft-hearted. But if we had more films of this type, films with educational as well as agitational features in them, less would be said against our motion picture theatres. Now, I did not wish to say anything harsh, I merely wanted to call the attention of the people to the fact that we must assume the responsibility of the stronger toward the weak."

Samuel Rabinovitch of the Hebrew Relief Association, said: "The greatest value of this drama lies in the fact that the very people whom we wish to reach with this education can be reached only through the motion picture show. The play is great, the interest is sustained to the end. Such a play has a greater educational value than any amount of pamphlets and public lectures."

Mrs. Alice Merry, director of the Lapham Park playground, said: "I am a firm believer in the motion picture shows. The play is remarkably true to life. In my work every day I visit tenements and sick rooms like those shown in the play. I know of no better way to educate the people than by a play of this sort."

Rabbi Hirshberg, who followed, stated that the pictured story showed not only wonderfully good pictures, but the latter told the story with enough sentiment to ameliorate the scenes of suffering due to consumption, and the harshness of the conditions which lead to it.

Health Commissioner Kraft was convinced that the "Red Cross Seal" film would be of immense educational value in the "white plague" fight, as the pictures would exert great influence with people who could not otherwise be reached.

Mrs. J. P. Sherer, of the Mothers'and Teachers' Club, predicted that the pictures will be a revelation to those who have never seen similar conditions, and she hoped that many such people would see them.

The Rev. H. H. Jacobs said: "I wish that every man and woman, who does not know what tuberculosis means in the homes of the poor, could see these pictures. They would then learn what the 'white plague' is and what buying a Red Cross Christmas seal means."

Mr. Hardin tells me that the Tuberculosis Society of Milwaukee will arrange to give the widest publicity to the "Red Cross Seal" in every theatre where it is shown by means of lectures, the press and special slides. Mr. Hardin also arranged with Mr. Dearholt, secretary in charge of the distribution of Red Cross Seal stamps in Wisconsin, to furnish him in advance the dates on which the film will be shown in cities throughout the state; and Mr. Dearholt in turn will secure newspaper publicity to interest the public in the sale of the stamps and gain their aid in this most worthy cause.

Everyone present at the exhibition in the Princess complimented and praised the Edison company for the enterprise shown in getting out the "Red Cross Seal" film and expressed wonder at the growing importance and value of motion pictures.

The dates announced for the exhibition of the "Red Cross Seal" in Milwaukee are: Princess theatre, Dec. 19 and 20; Globe theatre, Dec. 21 and 22; Modjeska theatre, Dec. 23 and 24. These three houses are on the Saxe circuit of six theatres.

Frank L. Hough, the western demonstrator for the Edison machine type B, assisted Mr. Hardin at the Milwaukee exhibition.

Immediately after his return from Milwaukee, Mr. Hardin had the "Red Cross Seal" exhibited in the private exhibition room of the Selig Polyscope Co., on Randolph street. That was on Thursday morning, Dec. 8, and among those invited there were present: Dr. Evans, president of the Chicago health department; Mr. H. N. Higginbotham, president of the board of directors of the Municipal Tuberculosis Sanitarium; Frederick R. Green, M. D., secretary of the council on health and public instruction of the American Medical Association; Frank E. Wing, superintendent of the Chicago Tuberculosis Institute, and M. L. Dorr, manager of the Red Cross Christmas seal distribution for the Chicago Tuberculosis Institute.

The film gave hearty satisfaction to all these gentlemen and Dr. Evans was especially enthusiastic over the educational value of the pictures. "It will stir the people up to a lively realization of the conditions that breed consumption. Just as the "Fly Pest" film taught them that the fly is not the harmless thing it was long supposed to be, so these pictures will teach a lesson on the importance of cleanliness, fresh air and the clearing away of rubbish in the vicinity of the home."

Dr. Evans arranged with Mr. Hardin for an exhibition of the "Red Cross Seal" at a meeting of the Visiting Nurses' Association of Illinois, early in January, and also at a meeting of the South Side Charitable Association of Chicago, in the near future.

Mr. Wing and Mr. Dorr heartily endorsed the film and were optimistic in their opinions on the great influence for good that it would exert. Mr. Wing requested Mr. Hardin to furnish him, in advance, the names of the theatres in Chicago and the dates on which the film will be shown, so that he might have time to give due publicity to the exhibitions through the city press. In the meantime Mr. Wing will try and arrange with the managers of these theatres for permission to sell Red Cross seal stamps on the premises, on the days of the exhibition of the film.

Just a word to exhibitors everywhere concerning the "Red Cross Seal." Here you have a subject that will appeal to hundreds of thousands of good people who have never entered a picture theatre. Now is your chance to get them into your houses. Interest the officers of your local health departments, your clergymen, benevolent and philanthropic societies, your Red Cross and Anti-Tuberculosis contingents. The cause is one that means the saving of hundreds of thousands of lives, and the anguish of incomputable suffering and bereavement. The press everywhere is ready to assist the movement ably and liberally. Arrange with Red Cross representatives and permit them to sll their seal stamps in your houses, on the days of exhibition. They will give you all the assistance in their power to herald widely the days of exhibition.

When the people who have never before viewed a picture in your theatre see the "Red Cross Seal" and the other licensed films on your programs they cannot fail to be impressed by the fact that they have been systematically missing many good things that make life happier and the mind broader. And, if your houses are neat and clean, the auditoriums well lighted during the projection of pictures, good order preserved, and your employes attentive and polite, you are bound to add many thousands of intelligent picture lovers to those already on your lists.

Benefit Ball of the M. P. & P. M. Operators.

The annual benefit ball of the Chicago motion picture and projecting operators, of Local 145, I. A. T. S. E., held at the Coliseum Annex Wednesday evening, December 7, was a great success and a very enjoyable event. Over 600 participated in the festivities, quite a number of whom were people prominent in the licensed and "independent" ranks of the picture industry.

All the officers and members of the executive boarl of Local 145 were present, including Fred E. Havill, James M. Coles, E. P. Smith, M. A. Cohen, W. F. Menzel, T. F. Mohr, C. V. Linn, B. P. White, J. Fuqua, Charles C. Funk, Lee A. Forbes and Henry Warmbold. Everyone present not members of Local 145 were impressed by the personnel of the men, and they expressed themselves as being confident that in no other city could an equal number of motion picture operators be assembled and maintain the same high average for intelligence and deportment. And I would be guilty of the gravest oversight were I to omit reference to the ladies present. They were sprightly daughters of Chicago, prepossessing, graceful, vivacious, well gowned and altogether charming.

The dance program was voted a "beaut," and in addition to the grand march included 15 numbers and three extras, the music being especially well rendered.

The souvenir program was quite a pretentious booklet, its pages displaying a large number of page and half-page advertisements manufacturers, importers and exchanges, both licensed and "independent," the licensed showing preponderating largely.

Pictures in Library Work.

As far as I know at the present writing, the city of Madison, Wis., can boast of making a new and original departure in the use of motion pictures. The Madison public library board in conjunction with M. S. Dudgeon of the state library commission, has installed motion pic-

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyright by J. H. Hallberg. All Rights Reserved.

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALK NO. 16.—The Indicating Watt Meter is an instrument which, while applied to a circuit will indicate or show while it is under observation the number of watts expended at a given instant in an electric circuit.

The Watt Hour Meter is an instrument which records the number of watt-hours expended in an electric circuit by moving the hands on a set of dials the same as on a gas meter.

Note—In view of another instrument now on the market which records the Watts by an ink line on a paper record, which is really a recording Watt meter, I now change the name of the electricity meter as used by the electric companies to the WATT HOUR METER.—Editor.

WATT HOUR METER (Continued).

The Watt Hour Meter, which was described in "Electrical Talk" No. 16, is a very simple device consisting of an electric motor driving several hands on small dials. The speed of the motor depending upon the voltage of the circuit, and the current passing through the field coils and also depending upon what is known as the "Power Factor" of an alternating current circuit, when used with A. C. load.

A rheostat or an incandescent lamp will operate at what is called "unity power factor" that is the voltage and current (the amperes) are in phase with each other. As a general rule, a rheostat is wound in the shape of a coil or spiral which makes it slightly "Inductive" when used on alternating current, but under ordinary conditions a rheostat or an electric heater and of course, incandescent lamps may be considered to represent "non-inductive" load operating at "unity power factor."

An electric motor, an arc lamp having magnet coils for its regulation, a motion picture arc lamp using an economizer, electro magnets and other devices, which contain one or more coils of wire having a number of turns, are put in the class called "inductive" load.

All apparatus in the "non-inductive" load class operate at practically "unity Power factor" and if you will refer to one of our previous "Electrical Talks," you will find that in order to obtain the number of watts consumed in any given circuit, the amperes should be multiplied by the volts, and this method of calculating is correct for all "non-inductive" loads.

Apparatus in the "inductive" load class do not operate at "unity power factor," but the current lags behind the voltage or electro motive force, therefore, if you multiply the voltage by the ampere you will obtain a reading which represents what is called the "apparent watts."

In order to measure the "actual watts" a watt meter is necessary because this instrument depends in its operation not only upon the product of the voltage and the amperes, but also upon the phase relation between the voltage and the current. In all circuits carrying "inductive" load the current lags behind the voltage. Sometimes this lag may be 10 per cent. in which case the system is said to have a "power factor" of 90 per cent.

An electric motor may operate on alternating current at an average "power factor" of 60 per cent. An M. P. lamp with an economizer may operate at a power factor of 80 per cent. A fan motor operating on alternating current, may operate a power factor of 50 per cent. The "power factor" becomes lower the more magnetic effect there is in the circuit because the greater the number of magnet turns surrounding iron, the greater will be the magnetic kick as the current reverses, and consequently the current will lag more and more behind the voltage, due to the counter voltage set up by the magnetic kick or reaction in the coil.

If the amperes and the volts multiplied by each other gives a certain number of watts, this reading represents the "apparent watts" and in order to give the "actual watts" consumed the "apparent watts" must be multiplied by the "power factor."

The indicating Watt meter or the Watt Hour Meter does all this work automatically, whereas, the volt meter, the ampere meter and the old Recording Ampere Hour meter would only indicate the "Apparent watts," which would be considerably higher than the "actual watts."

Suppose we have a motion picture arc lamp, with an economizer operating on 100 volt A. C. circuit requiring 20 amperes from the line, in that case multiply 100 volts by 20 amperes. This gives 2000 "apparent" watts.

We will assume that the "power factor" of the lamp and this economizer is 75 per cent. In order to find the actual watts multiply the "apparent" 2000 watts by the "power factor" .75. This gives you just 1500 watts or 1.5 K. W., which represents the "actual" watts required per hour for such an arc lamp with the economizer.

If this same motion picture arc lamp was operated with a choke coil or similar current saving device, on alternating current the amperes taken from the line would be 50, which multiplied by the 100 volts would equal 5000 "apparent" watts. The "power factor" of such a choke coil may be about 40 per cent. in which case, we should multiply 5000 by .40, which would give us just 2000 "actual" watts or 2 K. W.

Numerous other examples of this sort could be given, but I will go into more detail concerning this matter in a later talk.

The Watt Hour Meter as furnished and installed by the electric lighting company is a most accurate and reliable device. It is wrong for any consumer to believe, or even think, that the electric lighting company would willfully make his electric meter run fast or register when no load is on. I have personally had charge of one of the largest electric lighting plants in the United States where thousands of electric meters were in service and, I feel safe in making the statement that 90 per cent. of the errors in meters are in favor of the consumer because the electric meter is a motor and it depends upon its frictionless bearings to keep it operating freely, therefore the least disturbance to which the meter may be subjected, such as the cracking of a jewel, the breaking of the shaft point working on the jewel, the accumulation of dust, the presence of roaches or other insects within the meter, would stop it or make it run too slow. Do you believe that any public service corporation would willfully dare to instruct its meter testers to make a meter run faster than it ought to—not a bit of it. The risk would be too great, because if one of the employees in the meter department should leave the corporation and could prove that the electric lighting company made a practice of setting its meters too fast, the company would soon be prosecuted. Accidents will happen, but the chances are that if the electric bill is too high and remains high after the electric lighting company has been instructed to that effect and have tested their meter, the large bill is due to your having more load connected to your system or the lamps and other devices are in use longer than expected. In view of the foregoing, I think you may feel quite safe in depending upon the record of the electric meter.

SUMMARY.

The Watt Hour Meter registers only the "actual watts" consumed.

The "apparent watts" required by any load are determined by multiplying the amperes by the voltage.

The "actual watts" are determined by multiplying the "apparent watts" by the "power factor."

The "power factor" is obtained by dividing the "actual" watts by the "apparent" watts.

Direct current devices always operate at "unity power factor."

Alternating current devices, excepting incandescent lamps, certain forms of rheostats, and heaters always operate at less than "unity power factor."

Next "Electrical Talk" will show you how to read an electric meter.

MOTION PICTURES HELP INSANE

Majestic Amusement Co. Give Performance at Shelby County Insane Asylum—Dr. Anderson Pleased With Results

Since the use of motion pictures have been found to be of great benefit in helping cure the insane, Dr. J. A. Anderson, superintendent of the Shelby County Poor and Insane Asylum, Memphis, Tenn., is now trying to secure a motion picture machine with which to give regular performances at that well-known institution.

The first performance was given Nov. 18 in the auditorium of the asylum, and it proved a great success. Dr. Anderson made arrangements with Managers Buel B. Risinger and Charles E. Elravy, of the Majestic Amusement Company, who took out one of their newest machines and several reels of the latest pictures. These pictures consisted mostly of scenic and comedy films, which so delighted the inmates they wanted to see more of them.

At the exhibition Dr. Anderson had a number of the leading physicians of Memphis present, and at the conclusion of the performance all expressed themselves as highly pleased with the results and thought it to be most practical in every way. Dr. Anderson was also pleased and is anxious to install a machine immediately.

The Majestic Amusement Company is one of the leading photoplay concerns in the South and is always doing something modern to introduce specialty films. When Edison's "Boy Scouts of America" were shown, the management gave free tickets to all members of that organization in Memphis; when Gaumont's "Pharaoh, or Israel in Egypt," was shown, the clergy of the city were invited and passes were given to all physicians to see Pathe's "Micre-Cinematography of Recurrent Fever." The managers of the company find that specialty films pay and that by advertising in such a manner it creates interest in all parts of the city.

The Personality of the Photoplayhouse

The Real Secret of Successful Management Is An Ability to Give a Home Individuality

By EPES WINTHROP SARGENT (Chicot)

IT sounds absurd to refer to a mass of brick and stone as possessing a personality, but here photoplayhouse is not used in the sense of a building wherein photoplays are presented. The Photoplayhouse is that plus the pianist, the ushers, the operator, the ticket taker anl seller and the man who owns the place. All these are a part of the photoplayhouse as much as the walls, the chairs or the screen and the combination of place and people possess a personality pleasing or the reverse. It all depends upon the management.

One of the largest vaudeville circuits in existence was largely built up on the personality the manager gave his first house. It was a little theatre almost in the suburbs, appealing largely to the small clientele in the neighborhood. The bills were small because the salary list had to match the box office receipts. It was possible to get twice as much show for the same money at the cost of a short trolley ride, but the theatre had a pleasant personality and it made friends for itself. In a couple of years a second house was added, a house as agreeably polite as the first and now eight theatres trace their ancestry to the theatre that several managers had vainly sought to make successful.

It was purely a triumph of personality; the personality of the manager himself reflected in his staff and house. He was always carefully dressed, courteous and genial and so was his house. There was no dirt in obscure corners, no scratched walls or dingy ceilings, the seats were dusted and if you dropped a handkerchief on the floor it did not come up with last week's dirt clinging to it. The ushers were not given to hanging over the back rail watching the show, they were alert and courteous because they had to be. You felt you were welcome and when you went a second time it was like going to see an old friend.

There is another important theatre that has a grouchy personality. Once each year the seats are dusted, but the carpets have not been cleaned in some three years, the orchestra pit is so cramped that the musicians cannot play in comfort, the house attendants do not care whether a patron is comfortable or not and only the exceedingly high grade of the bills attracts the crowd. You go there to see this "headliner" or that star: not because you like to go to that theatre. The house has a bad personality but big bills. The bills save it. Other houses with grouchy dispositions cannot offer bills costing $5,000 a week and they suffer loss of business.

It is the same way in picture houses. There are photoplayhouses where everyone is so studiously polite that they annoy you. They are courteous but not genial, and a house that slaps you on the back and says "come on in and have a good time with me" is greatly to be preferred to the one that passes free ice water in glasses and presents the clammy hand of cold courtesy.

Then there is the hysterical photoplayhouse. Something happens to the machine and the show shuts down. The pianist bobs up from his seat and flutters to the operator's box, the operator struts importantly through the waiting audience to test connections and fuses and switches while he jangles his pliers and looks seven shades wiser than Solomon. It is all right while things go well, but when a blow up comes you tell yourself that you would hate to be there if there was a panic of any sort.

Perhaps you have seen the photoplayhouse that somehow suggests that it wants to be a church and is resentful because it must be devoted to the frivolous photoplays. There is an air of settled gloom about the place, a sort of just-back-from-the-funeral atmosphere that causes you to tread softly and speak in whispers if you are not too awed to speak at all. The place is bloodless, almost fleshless and generally it dies of its diseases. You go there once but you seldom repeat your visit.

But there are too many classifications to be catalogued here. The question is "are you impressing the proper sort of personality upon your house?" That question is not as silly as it sounds. Personality means profit if it's the proper sort.

You would not go around with a dirty face. Why then permit your photoplayhouse to have a dirty face? You may not be able to afford the services of a beauty doctor in the shape of an architect, you may not be able to afford an onyx and marble front, but a good broom can be bought for a quarter and cleaning cloths are not markedly affected by the high cost of living. You can have a clean front if you cannot afford an ornate one and the bright lobby keeps fresh with new paint and the scrubbing brush is a mark of proper personality. It is your introduction to a prospective patron, the first greeting to the regulars. Don't clutter your front with stock playbills pasted on plain boards. You can get neat brass frames for the regulation posters, or surely white wood moulding can be had with a glass to protect the paper. Make it look like a regular theatre and unlike the abode of the bearded lady and the two-headed calf. Make it smile and your patrons will smile back.

After you work the broom in the lobby, have it taken inside and used on the floor. You may not be able to afford a pneumatic cleaner, but hire one by the day now and then and take the dust out of your draperies. If you have a painted screen keep it touched up, don't let the piano get shabby and scarred and coax the pianist not to pile eight dollars worth of sheet music on the lid. See to it that your ushers stay on the job and are alert to lead the newcomer to a seat. Encourage your doorkeeper to give a greeting to every new arrival, but make certain that he knows the difference between a courteous greeting and offensive familiarity. It may take a little time to rouse them to a proper enthusiasm, but you can make it if you go about it right and have each member of your staff so genuinely interested in your success that your house has the personality that pleases. Set them a good example yourself. Get over the grouch and, whether you have a seating capacity of 200 or 2,000, you'll play to full seats because people like to come and visit you. It's personality that pays wherever you turn. Be sure yours is right.

THE STARTING TROUBLE DEPARTMENT

Questions and Some Answers by the Man Who is Bigger Potatoes than Edison—(Gros pommes de terre)

The Handbook—Hohokus, N. J., writes: Dear Old Pal. I bought a copy of your handbook and have tried to read it. Did you write it with your feet?

I went through your town, Hohokus, in 1884, on a coal car. No. I did not write the handbook with my feet. I wrote it by hand with such assistance as I got from some manufacturers and what you chaps have taught me through this column. It will be sent postpaid for $1.50 and is a handy thing to wear in your hip pocket. When your boss kicks you out for doing some of the things I advise perhaps he'll kick the book and it won't hurt so much. The book has been greatly kicked at already.

Wires—Lone Tree, N. M., writes: What sort of wire shall I use in connecting my lamp with the meter? If you will go to an electrical store, Lone Tree, they will sell you wire that is made for that purpose. Barbed wire is not good because you are liable to cut your hands. If you chew tobacco in the booth I should advise the kind that comes rubber coated—the wire, not the tobacco. My book tells all about this. I sell several other things. See if you don't want them.

Arizona—Gideon, Arizona. When I wrote you to put the shiny side of the film toward the screen I didn't know your exchange waterproofed all its film. I can't be expected to know everything. No. In such a case you do not put both sides of the film toward the screen. How can you? Use a little judgment and my handbook.

A Refusal—Confidential, Boston: I refuse to regard your communication as confidential. I am not a confidence man. I only sell the handbook and my readers and a few other little things. I can't help it if your lamp blew up when you followed my instructions. I'll print your questions again and perhaps some operator will answer them. You can find out a lot like that. I have. Have you my handbook? $1.50.

Wire Trouble—Boston writes that he has had trouble with his wiring and the fire department. Acting on a suggestion he connected both wires to the same screw on the lamp house, but that did not seem to work. Before I explain to Boston what the trouble is, I want to give some of the bright minds who read this column a chance to explain. Speak up boys.

Not Guilty—Centre Street, N. Y., wants to know if the background to my picture printed last week is the City Prison. It is not. I was in—no, I meant that for Boston. I was in Boston in 1910.

French—Puzzled, Montreal, wants to know what the occasional phrases in italics in this paper are. I am told it is French. Such queries do not belong to this department. We have trouble enough as it is.

Machines—Burdock, Mo., writes: I am about to start a picture house here. Can you advise me what is the best make of machine? Is the Edison a good one?

I am glad, friend Burdock, that you have come to the right place for advice. NO. The Edison used to be a good machine, but they stopped advertising. I would advise you to try the kind I recommend. I am having a catalog sent. If you are opening a house you will need a handbook. It is highly indorsed by the Whirled.

Condenser Breakage—Santa Paula, Cal., wrote that he stopped condenser breakage by putting a sheet of plain glass between the lamp and the condensers. He objects to my suggestion that the plain glass would break immediately. Now he reminds me that the breakage in condensers is due to the unequal expansion and contraction of the curved glass. I had not thought of that, Neighbor Santa Paula. Let some of the operators try it and if it works I'll put it in my next handbook.

Losing the Loop—Wissahickon, Pa., writes that he frequently loses the lower loop. In this office, friend Wissahickon, I notice that the stenographers tie their erasers to the typewriters with a bit of string. You might tie a string to the loop. Try it and report. We are always glad to get ideas, we need them.

Other Correspondents—We have received a number of other queries, but as these questions are all covered in our handbook we would advise our correspondents to send for the same. It does not matter how many other handbooks you may have, you need this. It is utterly unlike all others. See what the Whirled says about it. I certainly am doing my level best to qualify for any number of pieces of gold or silver. One dollar and fifty cents per copy, and a number of the articles can be used as a joke book.

WATERTOWN, WIS., TO HAVE NEW HOUSE

Joseph Heon Will Erect Fine House for Watertown Theatre Goers

Vaudeville and motion pictures will be at home in the new theatre in West Main street, Watertown, Wis., which will be opened to the public as soon as the present occupant, A. E. Baumann, vacates for his new place, and as soon as the necessary alterations can be made. The proprietor will be Joseph Heon, landlord of the Northwestern hotel, and he says he will make it one of the cosiest theatres in Wisconsin. It will be fashioned after the Crystal theatre in Milwaukee, and will open in vaudeville and motion pictures. The best teams and single acts in the country will be booked and if the public gives it their support it will continue in that line. If not, it will be run exclusively for the best in motion pictures at 5 cents admission.

The present building will be added to with an extension of 50 feet and there will be an orchestra pit, and boxes for those desiring them. Mr. Heon says that when finished the theatre will be a credit to the city as his aim will be to make it one of the handsomest cheap theatres in Wisconsin with a good line of attractions.

J. S. DOWLING BUYS THE LYRIC THEATRE.

John S. Dowling, a prominent business man at Hoosick Falls, N. Y., has purchased the well known photoplay theatre "The Lyric," from Mr. Smith. The Lyric is a modern little photoplay theatre and has been doing an excellent business ever since Mr. Smith took charge of it.

Mr. Dowling is a well known public spirited man and no doubt his management will greatly add to the popularity of the house. All the old staff will be retained, and Joseph Downie will sing the popular songs.

"ART AND THE LEGACY"

Interesting Lubin Comedy Drama

WHEN art and starvation are pitted against love and $5,000 a year, art is pretty sure to be counted out. This fact is illustrated in a beautiful film which will be released by the Lubin Manufacturing Company at an early date.

The plot of this pretty story is unique and, at the same time, simple and easily followed. The humor is good and wholesome and the acting is of high class.

Carl Mayfield and Alice Bennett were artists. That is, they had studios and dabbled with colors on canvas and hoped, some time, to make Rembrandt and Raphael look like "pikers."

SCENE FROM LUBIN SUBJECT "ART AND THE LEGACY."

Carl's father was the head of a big steel mill and Carl could have a job at $5,000 a year any time he gave up painting. The young people took their paintings to a dealer named Fleecum, who demanded a commission of 50 per cent. on all he sold. But he never sold any, and so, didn't get rich on their commissions. Then Alice one day received $200, a legacy from an aunt. She was just about to rush to Carl's studio with it when she thought of a better plan. She hurried to Fleecum's shop and bought one of Carl's daubs for $200, swearing Fleecum to strict secrecy. In due time Carl received a check for $100, the price of his picture, less Fleecum's commission. Of course, he thought he was hot on the trail of Rembrandt and Raphael and was about to hurry to Alice's studio and show her the check. But he reflected that she would be disappointed because none of her paintings had been sold. So he went to Fleecum's and bought one of her pictures for $100 and in due time she received her share, $50. Carl happened to be there when the money came and enjoyed her delight. As soon as she could slip away to Fleecum's she bought another of Carl's masterpieces for $50 and Carl, of course, received $25, which he immediately invested in one of her pictures.

Eventually they discovered each other's subterfuge. By that time the legacy had dwindled to $6.25, which was Carl's share of a painting that Alice had bought for $12.50. At the same time a letter arrived from Carl's father offering him, for the last time, a position at the steel mills at $5,000 a year. Then Carl and Alice woke up and decided to let Rembrandt and Raphael keep their laurels. Carl wired his acceptance of the position, "Coming tomorrow with my wife."

VERNON, TEXAS, TO HAVE NEW HOUSE.

The Dreamland theatre, Vernon, Texas, has been purchased by H. K. Greever from H. A. Hood. Mr. Greever is now planning to erect a new photoplay theatre in the near future, which will be one of the finest in "The Lone Star State."

Texas, at the present time, seems to be one of the modern states in the photoplay game. All the first class houses are doing a good business and the new towns are having first class houses erected. It is expected that Mr. Greever's theatre will be ready before spring.

NO LAW TO STOP SUNDAY PICTURES.

After studying the new prohibition laws as to Sunday closing of saloons and dance halls, Mayor Shank of Indianapolis, Ind., says he can see nothing in them whereby to stop the operation of motion picture theatres on Sunday. The mayor further says he sees no harm in running motion pictures on Sunday, and besides he and Superintendent Hyland, of the police department, have decided they are not a violation of the Sunday law.

In one of his recent statements, Mayor Shank said: "I am just as much in favor of observing Sunday as any one, but I don't see any harm in showing motion pictures. I told every one before I was elected I was not a preacher, and I am not."

"THE GREATER CALL"

A Strong Dramatic Photoplay by the Essanay Company

THE work of the new Essanay Chicago stock company has been highly complimented and among the recent Tuesday releases of the Essanay Company "The Greater Call," a dramatic photoplay of the stage, will be found one of the best.

The stage is always an alluring subject to the photoplaywright, and is generally well received by the public when the plot of the play is good and when the acting and photography conform with the quality of the story. "The Greater Call" is simple yet contains in good measure the best qualities of the serious drama. In its pathos there is a fine appeal to the heart while the moral is obvious.

The first scene opens on the stage of the Comedy theatre, showing a part of the wings and Claudine Durand's dressing room. The curtain has fallen on the last act and the star, assisted by her maid, is dressing for the street when Richard Grey, a young society man, and an admirer of Mlle. Durand, enters through the stage door and is shortly admitted to Claudine's dressing room. The actress greets him effusively, and after a short love scene Grey proposes and is accepted. Shortly after the two leave the theatre.

The scene changes to three years later. The two have married and their marriage has been blessed with a wee girl. The little domestic scene ushers in the first hint of Claudine's dissatisfaction with her life and her longing to return to the stage. Richard has noted with sinking heart his wife's melancholy and boredom and tremblingly reproaches her for her lack of interest in her home and their child. It is then that the storm breaks as Claudine sobbingly tells her husband that the lure of the stage is too great and that she must go back to it. Richard drops into a chair and his wife hurriedly leaves the room.

Ten years have elapsed and we find Claudine in her dressing room at the Comedy theatre when she is interrupted by a call boy who hands her a card bearing Richard's name. In a moment her desires to return to her home and to continue with her career hang on equal balance; she wavers and tells the boy to admit the gentleman.

Richard has brought with him the little girl, now a young lady of thirteen who but faintly remembers her mother and who for a moment clings to her father, hardly able to realize that this beautiful woman is her mother. Then there is an embrace in which all the pent-up love of the mother breaks down all restraint in Claudine as she takes the little one to her heart.

The scene is interrupted by the call boy who calls "Overture!" and Claudine is again the actress responding to the call of the multitude on the other side of the glittering footlights. Hurriedly making her toilet Claudine without even a parting word of goodbye runs out the door and on the stage.

Richard and the little girl leave the theatre while the man's heart beats fiercely in rage at the barrier between he and his wife.

A few weeks later shows another scene on the stage of the Comedy theatre with Claudine at her mirror in her dressing room and the usual throng of actresses, chorus girls and johnnies in the wings of the stage. The curtain has fallen on the first act when a messenger boy enters and, despite the orders of the management not to deliver messages to any of the company during the performance, manages to hand Mlle. Durand a telegram which the woman hastily opens and then sinks fainting into her chair. In a moment, however, she has recovered and seizing her wraps runs madly from the room, the message gripped in her hand. The stage manager stops her as she runs to the door; there is a moment's altercation during which Claudine shows him the message: "Come home at once. Your baby is dying," and is signed by Richard.

The manager implores her to continue until the close of the performance, but Claudine is deaf to his entreaties and entering a waiting cab is driven away while the manager throws up his hands in despair.

At home the little girl is just approaching the crisis of the fever and the doctor and Richard are waiting with sinking hearts for the bare hope of retaining the little white soul. It is then that Claudine enters and runs sobbing to her child, but the doctor holds her back until the child stirs and slowly opens her eyes. With a faint smile she holds out her arms to her mother, who sinks on her knees and lifts her eyes in thanks. The mother love has won and the woman has responded to the Greater Call.

The photoplay, it is said, is booked for an early release.

THE ADVANTAGES OF PICTURES.

That conservative paper, the New York Independent, recently printed a comprehensive article on the value of the motion picture and on the part it is playing in the life of the present generation. It places the picture above vaudeville and melodrama and shows how the silent drama, as produced, is superior in many respects to any previous form of dramatic art.

There are so many among us actively engaged in the motion picture business, in one capacity or another who fail to recognize the place in art which is the rightful due of the motion picture, that I herewith submit three short paragraphs of the article under consideration:

"The cinematograph is doing for the drama what the printing press did for literature, bringing another form of art into the daily life of the people. Plays are now within the reach, literally, of the poorest, as are good books and good pictures. The secret of cheapness in art as in other things is mechanical multiplication. So long as a play required for each presentation the active co-operation of a considerable number of more or less talented persons it could never be cheap, and in its better forms it was necessarily accessible to a comparatively small part of the population. But once on a celluloid film a spectacle can be reproduced indefinitely, the good as cheaply as the poor, and superiority is no longer handicapped.

"The motion picture shows are in general superior, both artistically and morally, to the vaudeville and melodrama that they have driven out of business. It is a mistake to suppose that their amazing popularity is due altogether to their low price of admission. On the contrary, the cinematograph has some advantages, not only over the cheap shows which it at first rivaled, but over any previous form of dramatic art. The most conspicuous of these advantages is spaciousness, distance. The stage is at the best but a narrow platform. The characters must dodge out of the wings or pop out of a door at the back. They have their exits and their entrances, but all both necessarily sudden, more "dramatic" than lifelike.

"But the motion picture show has a third dimension. The characters have a gradual approach and recession. The railroad train rushes toward the spectator; the horseman rides off through the woods or across the plain until he disappears in the distance. The scene of action is all outdoors."

ENLARGING EMPIRE PHOTOPLAY THEATRE

The Empire theatre, Lincoln, Ill., is to be enlarged considerably, a furnace is being installed and a stage is being built at the rear. In addition, the floor is to be "pitched" so that it will be better arranged for persons sitting at the rear of the house.

Workmen have already torn the rear wall of the house out. They will extend the rear back for quite a distance, about 50 feet, giving the room a length of 125 feet and a seating capacity of about 350 persons. There will be a stage built at the rear upon which the picture curtain will be placed and it also will be of sufficient size to accommodate vaudeville performances in case they should be installed by the management. The improvements are extensive and were contemplated by the management for some time, according to their statement. Their lease called for this improvement but delay of the owners of the property in making the change prompted the management of the show to make them before the cold weather of winter set in.

BIOGRAPH CO.

"THE LESSON."—"Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."—Ex. XX-12. Particular stress might be consistently put upon this precept, but woe betide those who are indifferent to this commandment, for our parents are ministers of God, and those who offer an affront to his minister irritate God. This Biograph subject teaches a most powerful lesson by showing the awful result of filial indifference. The Rev. Mr. Hollister, nearing the last milestone of life's journey, has but one ardent wish, and that is to see his son James wearing the cloth that he must now lay aside on account of his old age. The boy has had the advantage of an example in religious principles, but he has needed the guiding solicitude of a mother, she having long since died, so that James and his sister Ruth are raised by their father, the old minister. The old father loses no opportunity to point out the better way for James, hoping that he will follow in his footsteps. Ruth is also solicitous, she feeling that James is guilty at times of disobedience, in which conjecture she is right. James instead of harkening to his father's plea, though he ostensibly pretends to, spends most of his time in the corner saloons, becoming more addicted to drink, until through moral frailty the habit is formed to an irrepressible degree. The old minister's condition takes a sudden turn for the worse and upon the arrival of the doctor Ruth is informed that her father has but a few moments to live. The old man calls for his boy, but he at this hour is in a saloon intoxicated, rejecting the persuasions of even his companions to go home, for they are cognizant of the good man's weakness. Ruth knows too well where her brother is at this moment and can imagine his condition, but she conquers pride and goes out to search for him. Entering the saloon, she finds him in an almost helpless condition. The saloon-keeper, appreciating her embarrassment, begs her to leave, he intending to send the boy home. James misconstrues his actions and strikes him in resentment of a fancied insult, felling him. In the fall, he strikes his head on the foot rail and when the police arrive they find the brawl has resulted fatally for the saloon-keeper. In the excitement Ruth has gotten James out and to home, where he arrives only a few minutes before the messenger of death. The police learn who delivered the fatal blow and go to get him. Ruth hears them entering and intercepts their entrance into the sick room, begging them to hold off that her father may be kept in ignorance and his last moments peaceful. This they consent to do, and when the old minister breathes his last the boy is taken away to pay the penalty of his indifference to the greatest of God's commands.

"WHITE ROSES."—Bashfulness is an awful affliction. It causes more heartaches than any other ill that youth is prone to. "Faint heart ne'er won fair lady," unless Fate stepped in and helped matters along, as was the case with the hero of this Biograph comedy. Harry loved Betty, and vice versa; but Harry was fearfully bashful. No matter how he tried, he never could muster up sufficient courage to propose, despite the fact that Betty always endeavored to help him out. An idea! He writes his proposal, and invents a sentimental code of signals. The letter reads: "If you will accept me, wear red roses; if you are in doubt, the pink; if you do not love me and reject me, wear the white." He then repairs to the florist's and purchases the three shades of roses, despatching them by messenger to his lady's residence. The messenger, however, is a dime novel fiend, and while engrossed in the thrills of a harrowing story, loses the box of flowers, which are picked up by another boy. A policeman sees this boy with the box of flowers, and as he cannot give a clear account, he runs him in. In the meantime, the novel reader is in despair over his loss until a modern Good Samaritan seeing the boy in tears offers to help him when he hears his tale of woe. This well-meant generosity, however, twists the romance, for he procures white roses only. Of course Betty thinking only of Harry, wears them. Harry takes it for a hint to "beat it," and for revenge decides to marry his cook. The real box arrives at the station house, where is encountered a wise judge, aye! a modern Solomon, who, after investigating the details of the case, sends the officer with the flowers to the address given on the box and the letter, thus averting a heart tragedy.

"THE RECREATION OF AN HEIRESS."—We would hardly dare say that after all money is the real attraction in the matrimonial proposition, still in many cases it is the incentive. In this Biograph story it is the inducement. The designing mother strongly advises her son to look about for a wife with money, and let money play the important factor in the affair rather than love. The mother receives a letter which seems ominous as it reads: "Dear Friend—I am sending my niece, whom you have never seen, to you for a little recreation. As you know she is an heiress now, so kindly gratify her every whim." The very chance, so when the young lady arrives with her maid the boy immediately gets busy. The heiress, of course, is wise, and realizes this is no place for her to recreate. However, she feels she must deliver a jolt to this family of fortune hunters, and hence she writes the following letter: "Friend—By chance I learned that the heiress at your house changed places with her maid before arriving. If you are after her money you had better make up to the maid. A Friend." The son at once shifts his attentions to the maid and the niece allows him to go far enough to embarrass himself upon the disclosure when she enters the room with her grip, which she peremptorily orders the maid to take, giving the crestfallen mother and son the laugh.

EDISON MFG. CO.

"THE POLICE FORCE OF NEW YORK CITY."—A short time ago it was our pleasure to present to the Motion Picture public a film entitled "Riders of the Plains" which showed the workings of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police of Canada. Today with equal pleasure we present the above subject, which shows the police force of New York City in many of their operations. In one case we showed a body of men, relatively small in number, controlling a vast area of territory and here we show a large body of men responsible for law and order in next to the greatest city in the world. It need not be supposed that the work of the latter is easy simply because they are in the midst of civilization and a large population instead of on the plains of the West. Observers of the film will discover that these men are trained in exercises and discipline quite as much as their brethren of the West.

The film starts with a small section showing how the traffic in New York City is handled on an ordinary day at the junction of Broadway, Twenty-third street and Fifth avenue. With the arteries of travel running in several different directions, this is probably the most difficult spot in New York City to successfully handle, and yet the system is to-day so perfect that the traffic moves, stops and moves again almost like clockwork. We then take up the work of the mounted police, starting with the breaking in of green horses for police work on Long Island, showing the whole force at drill in Central Park, and then giving several views of mounted officers stopping and catching runaways. This portion of the film is most sensational and calculated to bring the spectator to his feet.

After that we take up the police work in the harbor, showing them in a typical rescue of a drowning man and catching some river thieves who have attempted to steal a rowboat. Finally we show in a number of interesting scenes the police dogs, which are the latest adjuncts of the force. These dogs operate in the suburban districts and are of great value to the police in capturing burglars, enabling one man to cover much more territory than he otherwise could. The dogs are trained for this particular purpose and, while under good subjection, they are always muzzled in any kind of practice work, as when they are let loose upon a man their one thought is to bring him down, and if not muzzled they would be liable to do serious injury.

Altogether the film is a novel one, showing even to residents of New York City many things about its much talked of police force which they never realized before, and to other cities and abroad it will undoubtedly be something of a revelation. It is by special permission and a fortunate chain of circumstances that we were enabled to take this interesting picture, and we take no little pride in presenting it to the public.

"THE JOKE THEY PLAYED ON BUMPTIOUS."—This latest experience of our jolly little friend Bumptious is new evidence of the fun that lies in facial expression and of the fact that slapstick and horseplay are not necessary in the production of laughter.

Mr. Bumptious is dining in town, and we see him initiated into the ways of high society and drinking his first cocktail. He is a little suspicious of the mixture, but is reassured by the people of the party. After the ladies have been taken home one of the practical jokers of the company suggests that they take Bumptious to the club with them. There the joker and three of his friends proceed to put to test an experiment which they think will result in a great deal of fun for themselves at the expense of little Bumptious.

They tip the waiter off to mix numerous cocktails of harmless ginger ale. Then they proceed, one after another, to persuade Mr. Bumptious that these innocent cocktails are having a very disastrous effect upon him and that he is becoming disgracefully drunk. The suggestion begins to take effect very soon and Bumptious shows real uneasiness, but is bluffed into taking one or two cocktails even after this. Then as new members of the party tell him of his appearance and suggest intoxication and all its effects to him, the suggestions begin to become apparent in his actions.

Finally they get him to try to walk a crack, and by that time they have so worked upon his emotions that he is unable to steer straight and is truly convinced that he is in a disgraceful state. As he sits at the table pondering how he shall explain his condition to his wife when he gets home, the jokers slip an extra pipe beside the one lying in front of him, and he believes that he is seeing double. When a third and even a fourth pipe appear before his distorted vision he almost resigns himself to tears.

While the jokers are enjoying the result of their success the old grey haired steward of the club comes by, and seeing our hero's condition, listens to his story and tells him of the joke which has been played upon him. Mr. Bumptious decides that the joke has more than one side and that he will show the jokers the other. He suddenly seems to have acquired a very hilarious sort of a jag, and getting to his feet he emits warwhoops which summon all of the habitues of the club, to whom he proceeds to give an imitation of a violent and recklessly intoxicated gentleman.

He seizes a poker and smashes about him with such effect that the chandelier, all of the glasses and bottles on the buffet and even the steins on the mantelpiece fall before his blows. Finally demolishing a big lamp which stands in his way he drops the poker and then, winking mischievously to himself, saunters calmly out of the club, leaving the astonished jokers to pay the appalling bill of damages occasioned by their brilliant (?) scheme.

This film should add materially to the warm reception which is accorded when the name of Edison is thrown on the screen. It is a full reel, up-to-date, up-to-the-minute comedy of the very best order, delightfully played by the Edison Company actors, and should draw dollars—new dollars—to any theatre where it is shown.

"A CHRISTMAS CAROL."—This arrangement of the most popular of all Dickens' wonderful writings makes its appearance at an opportune time, and like the story from which it is taken, should spread the feeling of the Spirit of Christmas abroad in the world and add to the joy and good humor and consciousness of universal brotherhood which should reign during the Christmas season.

The story begins in the office of Scrooge, described as "a wrenching, squeezing, grasping, covetous old sinner." He is visited by the charity workers, who want him to contribute to the Christmas funds for the poor. He shows them the door and then declines an invitation from his nephew and the latter's Christmas wishes, because the Spirit of Christmas is not with him.

After finishing his Christmas Eve's work by scolding his poor humble clerk, Bob Cratchit, he hies him home. At the door we see the knocker change visibly before his eyes to the face of his former partner, Marley, long since dead, and during the night he is visited by Marley, who introduces him anew to the long forgotten Spirit of Christmas.

The Spirit shows him in successive visions his happy childhood days when he was young and free, the breaking of his engagement to the woman who later marries happily, and then shifting to the present Christmas, shows him Bob Cratchit's humble family enjoying their Christmas dinner, which consists of the bare necessities of life. He sees his nephew disappointed by being refused the hand of the one girl he loves, because of his poverty—poverty which Scrooge could help.

And then peering forward into the future, the Spirit shows him the picture of himself lying in his lonely room without the care or love of anyone. He reads his own tombstone, which tells a pitiful story—that he lived and died without a friend. This vision proves too much for Scrooge's hardness. He repents of his former mode of life and staggering back, drops unconscious upon his bed. When he awakens he is a changed man, with a firm determination to live a life of love for his friends instead of for his funds. He accordingly calls on his nephew (on the way meeting the charity workers and contributing to their fund for the poor), and when he finds the nephew with his little fiancee, he gives him a paper telling him that as his partner he will be amply able to marry the girl of his choice.

And then he takes the young people with him, and loading themselves with good things, they repair to Bob Cratchit's humble home. Of course Cratchit thinks that his employer is crazy when he sees him smile upon him and sees the good things which are brought; but he is not long in being convinced, and we feel sure that Cratchit and his little lame child, "Tiny Tim," will be well cared for in the future.

The story is impressive and wonderfuly effective in its dramatic and sympathetic appeal, and photographically will probably rank with the very highest productions that the motion picture world has yet seen. The visions and ghosts possess an unsubstantiality which is new and beautiful in the extreme. To those who know Dickens' story it will seem like bringing to life the beloved characters, while to those who have not read the original it will be a pleasant and sweet introduction to Dickens, and to all it will be an addition to the joy of the Christmas time.

"A WESTERN WELCOME."—John and Mary, a young married couple, are invited by their Aunt Mary, who has never seen them, to spend their honeymoon with her at her home in Texas. They accept the kind offer of her hospitality and start for the little Texan town, arriving at the station and taking the local conveyance to the home of Aunt Mary.

It is the custom in Texas, as in many Southern states, to work the convicts on the roads and other public improvements, and on the very day John and Mary reach Texas a couple of convicts escape from the gang and flee to the tall grass and underbrush. The two newlyweds come along, the fleeing convicts stop them and make them change clothes with them, and we soon see the convicts transformed into the bride and groom and the "honeymooners" appear in prison stripes. It is a case of being stripped or striped, and they try to make the best of their dilemma.

Their troubles soon begin when a reward is posted for the recapture of the fugitives from justice. The sheriff and his aids are soon on the scent and come up with John and Mary, who are mistaken for the convicts. The two young people take to their heels, pursued by the sheriff, and the chase is an obstacle race, long and laughable.

The disguised rascals find the letter from Aunt Mary in John's coat pocket and they "beat it" for the old lady's home, where they are received with open arms and a well prepared meal, which they eat with more gusto than grace.

While they are enjoying Aunt Mary's welcome John and Mary enter in their enforced attire, almost frightening their poor aunt to death. The convicts, in order to save themselves, bind the young man and wife with Aunt Mary's assistance.

The sheriff is right behind them and, when they catch up with the "getaways" they readily understand the predicament of Mary and John and make captive the real criminals.

John and Mary are released. Aunt Mary now gives them the reception which has been interrupted and deferred, but not lessened in fervor and whole-souled sincerity.

saying that all hands on the ship were lost. She grieves for the loss of her lover and her mind is ever with those on the deep, and she always keeps a light in the window which looks out upon the sea as sort of a memoriam and a beacon to those who sail upon its waters.

Twenty years have passed and many changes have taken place—Lavinia's mother has died; Seth has been prosperous and is now a retired sea captain; the child he saved from the wreck he has adopted as his own son. Lavinia's younger sister has a family and her daughter, now a young lady, comes to live with her aunt Lavinia to be a companion and daughter to her.

Seth, about this time, longs to go back to the scenes of his boyhood and see how the old place looks; he takes his son with him. He recognizes Lavinia's old home and all its pleasant associations, and thinks he would like to see who lives there now. He finds his old sweetheart still in possession, makes himself known, they renew the old flame and agree to get married. Lavinia's niece now appears with Seth's boy and they too are very fond of each other.

Seth and Lavinia are now married and living at the old home where their early courting was done and in the ripeness and fullness of their older years, with the two young people with them they are happily enjoying the blessed serenity of the evening of their lives, thoroughly contented in the well tested and proven constancy of their love.

"CLANCY."—"Who is Clancy?" He's a "cop;" that's what he is called by those who do not care what they say. You will readily recognize him as a policeman and a hero, a conscientious, fearless custodian of the public peace and property.

Clancy attracts attention as the protector of a working girl from the insults of a gang of loafers. He escorts the girl to her home and as she is leaving him she accidentally drops her handkerchief and he picks it up as a souvenir, for he apparently has been very much impressed by her charms and grace.

The ruffians are sore at Clancy and the "Gas House Gang" consider him a "Buttinsky," whom they swear to put out of the way the first chance they get. A man of nerve and metal, our hero gives little heed to their threats, but goes on in the performance of his duties.

At the station house Clancy and his fellow officers are awaiting orders when a call comes to hasten to the Gem Theatre, where the "Gas House Gang" has taken possession and are rough housing it. Clancy leads the reserves to the motion picture house, and after a hard struggle arrest the leaders of the gang and lock them up.

A few days after this encounter, Clancy, with bandaged head, is called before the Police Inspector and Captain and given a shield, commission and promotion to sergeancy. Happy in his advancement, he soon proposes to the girl of his choice, is readily accepted and later Sergeant Clancy is seen at the head of his battalion in the annual police parade.

Three or four years later, happily married, Clancy is seen in his pretty little flat with his wife and baby. It is Christmas Eve and preparations are now being made for the little one's gifts and the trimming of the tree. Time for the Sergeant to get out on his beat; with an affectionate farewell he leaves his wife to be about his duty.

The gang are at their old tricks and Clancy is at his post, and he is not long in getting wise to the fact that they have been robbing someone. He makes one of the "plugs" show up and then arrests him. The thugs go for him. He blows his whistle for assistance, which is soon at hand, and the gang lays low and waits until the brave fellow is alone. They don't have to wait long; he steps up to one of them and orders him to move on. Suddenly the officer is struck from behind and falls senseless to the ground; the gang has made good its threat.

Mrs. Clancy in her flat is getting the Christmas tree lighted to surprise her husband when she is surprised by the appearance of the captain of Clancy's precinct, who tells her as delicately as possible that her husband is dead. His brother officers bear his body into the room and leave Mrs. Clancy and the baby alone with the inanimate form of the noble Clancy.

"JEAN AND THE WAIF."—Why do some people adopt a dog and lavish their affections upon it instead of some poor child? In some cases it is a matter of preference; in others a dog is easier to get than a child. Surely as a dog, she was having her day and some very comfortable nights, too.

The Browns were childless and they took Jean to their hearts and home and made a great fuss over the dog as if it were their own child, buying delicacies for it, feeding and fondling it as if it were human, in trying to satisfy their longings and desire for an offspring of their own flesh and blood. Mrs. Brown's mother love is touched more keenly as she looks out the window into the house next door and sees a little child being tucked in its bed by loving and parental hands.

In contrast to the pampered dog we now look upon a different picture, a poor child living in environments of an entirely different nature. She is an orphan, a drudge in a working people's boarding house of a cheap character. She is abused and overworked by the landlady, who is hard and abusive.

It is Christmas Eve and poor Adele has no loving one to tuck her in her bed, none of the toys and remembrances so dear to children for which the Christmas season is most peculiarly and particularly their own. She must be content to snuggle up in a cold garret ramshackle bed with a little paper doll as her only reminder of Christmas and its joys.

She is smarting under a beating from the landlady bountiful, and her little heart is aroused to rebellion and desertion; and she is moved to action, dresses herself and leaves the "house of too much trouble."

Going out into the dark street, the snow falling and the winds blowing, she wanders, knowing not where, until, almost frozen, she reaches the unlocked basement doorway of the Brown's home. Feeling her way through the hall, she peers into the kitchen. She sees the cook entertaining company, steals upstairs into the bedroom where Jean is snugly sleeping in its pretty bed in little "nighties" and cap. She has been a much petted dog, but not by any means spoiled; she sees the little girl and looks pleased, as if to say: "Come on in and go to sleep." Adele takes off her shoes and jumps into bed with Jean, who cuddles up close to the child and soon they are both in dreamland.

Christmas morning Jean wakes first and barks out a "Merry Christmas" that brings Mr. and Mrs. Brown into the room, and, to their delight and surprise, find Adele, whom they accept as a special gift and adopt as their own daughter, lavishing their love and kindness upon her. Jean becomes just a dog once more, and a close friend to Adele. Jean sleeps in the big armchair while Adele occupies the pretty bed, and, after she is sound asleep, Jean waits a chance and jumps into the bed with Adele, gets under the covering and goes to sleep in the arms of the little girl.

as he always goes through the secret panel, and once there entirely changes his appearance by means of a wig and makeup. Greedy, he resolves on a still more ambitious scheme. He advertises a new bank with an absurdly high-sounding name, and an absurdly high rate of interest. His daughter's fiance entrusts his money to this new bank, and is accompanied by Mrs. Rinster when he makes the deposit, but even she does not recognize her husband in his disguise. The crash comes, and the doors of the bank are closed, and the banker disappears. Ralph is ruined and is told cruelly by his sweetheart's father that their engagement must end. Accompanied by an angry crowd of depositors, Ralph forces his way into the bank. He enters the private office and accidentally presses a knob that opens the sliding panel. He rushes through accompanied by two or three of the others. The banker is discovered in the act of concealing some bags of cash. Ralph's suspicions are aroused. He makes a snatch at the man's wig, and to his horror the features of his sweetheart's father are revealed. The ill-gotten money is restored to the depositors. Then Ralph realizes that for the sake of his future wife the best thing to do is to hush up the matter and stifle scandal. On his part, Rinster promises that his future life shall be blameless, and so the story ends happily.

"HUNTING SEA LIONS IN TASMANIA."—A magnificent scenic picture, full of interest, as it portrays a sport of which few have partaken.

"THE RUNAWAY MOTOR CAR."—Jim Scowles has the automobile fever bad, and when his rich uncle writes him that he has decided to forgive him for marrying against his wishes and that he is sending him a horseless carriage, his joy knows no bounds. He stops at the stores on Automobile Row and looks the cars over, and when he sleeps he can dream of nothing but speeding in a fine car, and does not awake until struggling in the hands of a bicycle policeman. In anticipation he borrows a friend's car, with the result that in his inexperience it runs away with him through miles of country, and after many incidents that must be seen on the screen to be enjoyed he is hurled through the air as the machine explodes and falls to the ground severely hurt. Taken home, he is in a few weeks convalescent, when one day Bridget comes and tells him the horseless carriage is in the garage. What sort or make of carriage it is we will not disclose, but it certainly was not what he expected. Those who remember the famous comedy,

"The Runaway Horse," will find in this a worthy successor. The doings of this runaway automobile and the scene where the machine explodes and Jim is hurled through the air will make your audiences sit up.

"MAX GOES SKI-ING."—In a snowy Alpine district Max takes his first lessons in the art of ski-ing. He leaves his hotel with his skis fixed to his shoes, and his efforts and contortions to get through the door of his room are absurdly ludicrous. Finally he manages to get out and we see him making frantic efforts to maintain his equilibrium on a fairly gentle slope. Max is plucky, and in spite of numerous falls, sticks to his purpose, although his attitudes and the knots in which he ties himself are excruciatingly funny. Finally we find him making his first leap; it is not exactly successful, and in the last scene the unhappy novice appears to be endeavoring to escape from the snowballs that the children of the village are pelting him with.

"THE LUCKY CHARM."—Alberto is in love with Letitia, but her hard-hearted guardian keeps her safe within the castle walls. Alberto manages to get in, and while in the midst of singing a love ditty is discovered by her guardian. He promptly has the young man taken to the kitchen and set to work peeling potatoes. This causes intense delight to the cooks and scullions. They stand and jeer at him, but their attention being called to a disturbance in the courtyard, Letitia flies in to console him. Her guardian appears, however, and has Alberto led out beyond the precincts of the castle, mounted on a mule with his face to the tail. He has the good luck before long to fall off the mule without the man at the bridle being aware of the fact. At the spot where he lands he sees a horseshoe, and picking it up it turns into a fairy, who tells him that all his wishes will be realized by means of this horseshoe. He rushes back to the castle kitchen, and with one wave transforms all the cooks into enormous vegetables. He next looks for the hard-hearted guardian, and finding him in the grounds, changes him into a fat pig, which he finds much satisfaction in chasing with a business-looking switch. All impediments to the union being

"BETTY'S FIREWORKS."—Betty plays truant and fills her satchel with crackers and other fireworks. Having thrown a few in the classroom, where both scholars and mistress are left shrieking with dismay, she attaches some crackers to two women who are busy gossiping. Frightened out of their lives they fall and roll over. Nothing seems to deter her, and in turn she has placed crackers on several people and two policemen. At last the balance are attached to a motor car and set off to the astonishment of the occupants. Betty returns to the store, where she sets fire to the complete stock of fireworks, which necessitates the presence of the fire brigade.

"SUNSHINE IN POVERTY ROW."—The story relates to two poor children whose father is out of work and whose mother is sick. They live in a squalid tenement in Poverty Row. The doctor, sent by a local charitable organization, prescribes medicine for the wife, but they have no money to purchase it. The father has but a nickel left. The children, eight and three years of age, are out gathering wood from around the builders' yards. On their way home their thoughts center on Christmas at the sight of the toys that are tastefully displayed in a window of a store. They realize that the following day is Christmas Day. On returning to the two-room tenement that is their wretched home they go in to their bedroom while the doctor is with their mother. The elder writes a letter addressed to "Santa Claus, Heaven," in which he asks him to remember them. The doctor departing, they go to their parents, and the father finds that all that is left in the house is a dry crust of bread. He gives them his last coin and sends them out with a bottle to purchase some milk. On the road they mail the letter, which in due course reaches the post-office. A sorter shows it to the superintendent, who in turn shows it to the postmaster, who happens in then. The latter places it in his pocket and returns to his sumptuous home to see his little daughter asleep in her cot, while his wife has gaily decorated a fine Christmas tree for the following day. She sees the letter protruding from his pocket, and taking it out they read it sadly. The same idea strikes both, they put on their wraps and taking a goodly load of the magnificent toys destined for their own little girl, proceed to Poverty Row. Meantime the two poor children have returned home and eaten their meal of bread and milk. They say good-night to their parents and retire to their room. There they hang up their stockings, and having said their prayers, retire to sleep. The postmaster and his wife enter the squalid dwelling, and showing the letter to the poor father, steal in on tiptoe and deposit the toys at the feet of the children's stockings. The children are not disturbed, but happy in their slumber dream that they see the factory of Santa Claus in full blast. They see the toys being made, and the fairies filling a big bag which Santa places on his shoulder. They see him emerge from the fireplace of their room and deposit the presents on the floor. They wake up. It is morning. They find it was not a dream. In reality the toys are there. Each taking some, they rush to tell their parents, and the picture ends with a clever tableau showing the poor man's Christmas and the postmaster's Christmas.

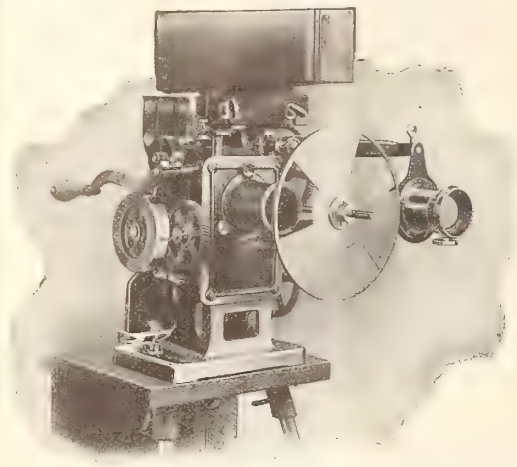
POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6

The Perfect Motion Picture Machine



A moving picture machine is an investment, and you want a machine that will last.

"Power's No. 6" is the most substantially built machine in the world.

The strength is put where it is needed.

Heavy spindles, long bearings, massive frame, wide gears, unique tempered tool steel and intermittent movement running in oil make it outlast all other machines. That is why we are able to guarantee it unconditionally for a year.

As for the picture, compare it with the picture produced by any other machine.

One exhibitor, using "Power's No. 6," has a standing offer of One Hundred Dollars to any exhibitor using another make of machine, who can project as good a picture.

Can you ask better proof of the merits of a machine?

the little Indian village at its base, wild wood and shagged undergrowth hid from view the glories of the outer world, Black Bear and his squaw Red Bird disagree over the drinking of rum and the squaw is wounded when she tries to destroy the bottle. An old trapper hearing the shot, runs to the spot from which the sound came, finds Red Bird wounded and carries her off to the army post, where the kind old Colonel Beverly and his daughter orders her cared for, and she is finally nursed back to life and becomes very friendly to the colonel and devoted to his daughter.

One day the colonel receives a letter stating that his son, who is attached to another post under Colonel Fremont, is seriously ill, and that in his deliriums he calls for his sister, asking that she be sent as soon as possible. The old trapper offers to guide her there, and Red Bird begs to accompany them and is allowed to do so. The start is made on horseback, riding through the forest. Indians are seen following them. Black Bear has started an uprising for revenge. While the trapper swims across the lake for a canoe to get the girls across, the colonel's daughter is carried away and the guide captured.

The faithful Red Bird escapes and steals into the Indian village at night and releases the guide, who effects also the escape of the colonel's daughter, making a hasty retreat in the little boat at hand. They are followed by the irate Indians, and finally; almost exhausted, reach the desert plains, only to find flames sweeping everything before. Famished for want of water and worn from fatigue, poor Red Bird dies and leaves old Joe the trapper and Helen to push on alone to the post. After many days of weary travel they reach the post. Fremont rescues and cares for them, and the son survives to see his sister and dies in her arms, completing a beautiful story full of pathos and sentiment.

"JOHN DOUGH AND THE CHERUB."—The prophecy is fulfilled and John Dough becomes the King of Lo-Hi. As King of the Lowlanders and Highlanders he assumes the dignified duties of a ruling monarch but with no degree of satisfaction to his adherents or happiness to himself, as the evil spirit of the witches and trend of natural events strew with shagged breakers the paths of the "ship of state"—the alchemist entrusts his wonderful elixir of life to the Baker woman for safekeeping, who, being color blind mistakes the precious elixir for a rheumatism cure and the application has startling effects. Neglecting to dispose of the contents of the bowl—same finds its way into Baker's bread and the result almost proves the undoing of Lo-Hi-John Dough gives his assistance in the celebration of the 4th. No end of trouble results from the invasion of his peaceful rest by the much despised Miffkits—then comes the cherub who introduces Dough to his animal friends, incidently secures supplies. He then visits the fairies' garden and later interviews the Princess Ozma who makes a prophecy—"The Throne of Lo-Hi shall vacant be until the coming by air or sea of an oven baked man and a Cherub wee." Accordingly John Dough drops into the Land of Oz, and meets the Cherub. Through their companionship then we see them encountering the tempestuous seas of frills and pains alike and the completion of the weird and wonderful fairy tale of the Kingly rulers of Lo-Hi.

"AN AMERICAN COUNT."—Clara Blakeman receives a letter from a girl friend in France stating that she has arranged for her to meet Count de Barbes, who is about to visit America. The friend also sends a photograph of the count. Clara has always wanted to meet a person of title, and her ambition now seems about to be realized. She notifies Ralph Dexmore, her lover, that their engagement is broken. Ralph loses no time in calling on Clara for an explanation, but her ears are closed to his pleadings. In the meantime Clara's father has learned of the count's visit and of the effect it has had on his daughter. He much prefers a plain American to a foreign count as a son-in-law, and conceives an idea whereby he can "sidetrack" the count. He informs Ralph of his scheme and the young man enters into it with the greatest enthusiasm. Taking the photograph of the count, the father and Ralph go to a costumer where Ralph is "made up" to look like the count. The bogus count now calls. He is received graciously by Clara and wins her. The father gives his consent with remarkable alacrity, much to the girl's delight. A hasty wedding is arranged and a few friends are invited. After the ceremony the father steps forward, removes the disguise from the "count" and says to his daughter, "Your husband is nothing more than a true American citizen." Clara had evidently regretted her step even while the ceremony was being performed. When she realizes that she has really married her old sweetheart and quickly finds refuge in his arms. Just at that moment a servant brings in a card announcing the real Count de Barbes, who is shown in. He is a little man who wouldn't stand much chance of taking a prize in a beauty show. His appearance and actions afford considerable amusement for the guests. The count loses no time in getting on his knees and pleading for the girl's love. But Clara's father takes a hand. He calls the servants and the poor count is thrown out of the house bodily.

"THE DEAD LETTER."—Jane and Ned are lovers just after the war in the late '60s. Jane is a bit of a coquette and, of course, likes a little flirtation. At a ball, while Ned is declaring his love for her, she pretends to be quite indifferent and, when a rival comes in and asks for a dance, she consents with apparently the greatest pleasure. Ned, left alone, gives up hope. He calls for his coat and leaves the house. Jane is surprised and disappointed when she returns and finds he has gone. At home she gives way to tears and then writes a letter asking Ned to forgive her. The days pass and no answer comes. Then Jane moves to another city and loses all trace of her lover. The scene now moves forward about 25 years. Jane's niece and Ned's nephew, respectively Nell and Tom, are lovers. Tom receives an appointment in the Dead Letter Office in Washington. Some letters are forwarded there by a postmaster who stated that they were found in the wall of an old building which was being torn down. Among them Tom finds one addressed to his uncle. He secures it and immediately leaves for Ned's home. When Ned reads the letter he breaks down. He shows Tom some treasured keepsakes and mourns the years that are gone. But it is not yet too late to foil Fate. Ned is a spruce bachelor of 50 and Jane is 45 and well preserved. Tom and Ned journey together to Jane's home and they are happily reunited, while Tom and Nell gaily do the bless-you-my-children act. Of course, there is a double wedding.

"THE GREATER CALL."—The first scene opens on the stage of the Comedy Theatre, showing a part of the wings and Claudine Durand's dressing room. The curtain has fallen on the last act and the star, assisted by her maid, is dressing for the street when Richard Grey, a young society man, and an admirer of Mlle. Durand, enters through the stage door and is shortly admitted to Claudine's dressing room. The actress greets him effusively, and after a short love scene Grey proposes and is accepted. Shortly after the two leave the theatre.

The scene changes to three years later. The two have married and their marriage has been blessed with a wee girl. The little domestic scene ushers in the first hint of Claudine's dissatisfaction with her life and her longing to return to the stage. Richard has noted, with sinking heart, his wife's melancholy and boredom and trembling reproaches her for her lack of interest in her home and child. It is then that the storm breaks as Claudine sobbingly tells her husband that the lure of the stage is too great and that she must go back to it. Richard drops into a chair and his wife hurriedly leaves the room.

Ten years have elapsed and we find Claudine in her dressing room at the Comedy Theatre, when she is interrupted by a call boy who hands her a card bearing Richard's name. In a moment when her desires to return to her home and to continue with her career hang on equal balance she wavers and tells the boy to admit the gentleman.

Richard has brought with him the little girl, now a young lady of thirteen, who but faintly remembers her mother, and who for a moment clings to her father, hardly able to realize that this beautiful woman is her mother. Then there is an embrace in which the pent-up love of the mother breaks down all restraint in Claudine as she takes the little one to her heart.

The scene is interrupted by the call boy who call

"Overture," and Claudine is again the actress responding to the call of the multitude on the other side of the glittering footlights. Hurriedly making her toilet Claudine, without even a parting word of good-bye, runs out the door and on the stage.

Richard and the little girl leave the theatre while the man's heart beats fiercely in rage at the barrier between he and his wife.

A few weeks later shows another scene on the stage of the Comedy Theatre, with Claudine at her mirror in her dressing room and the usual throng of actresses, chorus girls and johnnies in the wings of the stage. The curtain has fallen on the first act when a messenger boy enters and despite the order of the management not to deliver messages to any of the company during the performance, manages to hand Mlle. Durand a telegram which the woman hastily opens and then sinks fainting into her chair. In a moment, however, she has recovered and seizing her wraps runs madly from the room, the message gripped in her hand. The stage manager stops her as she runs to the door; there is a moment's altercation during which Claudine shows him the message: "Come home at once. Your baby is dying," and it is signed by Richard.

The manager implores her to continue until the close of the performance, but Claudine is deaf to his entreaties and entering a waiting cab is driven away while the manager throws up his hands in despair.

At home the little girl is just approaching the crisis of the fever and the doctor and Richard are waiting with sinking hearts for the bare hope of retaining the little white soul. It is then that Claudine enters and runs sobbing to her child, but the doctor holds her back until the child stirs and slowly opens her eyes. With a faint smile she holds out her arms of her mother, who sinks on her knees and lifts her eyes in thanks. The mother love has won and the woman has responded to the Greater Call.

"HANK AND LANK."—Always on the lookout for easy money, "Hank and Lank," our favorite comedians, see an opportunity to get a square meal when they are inspired by the methods of a blind man, preying upon public charity.

"Hank and Lank" decide that it is easy to imitate the blind man, and hie away just too late, however, to see the supposed blind man arrested for imposing upon the public.

Hank has the first chance, and after painting a sign which is attached to his coat, he takes a position at a busy corner. Donations come quick and fast. Every passerby drops a coin into his little cup.

Lank, who has watched the operation with considerable interest, is anxious to try his hand at the graft and the two stroll away to the spot where they had seen the first beggar. For a time Lank is successful until a policeman, who had arrested blind man No. 1, comes on the scene, and after a struggle takes Lank away to the lock-up.

The film ends here with Lank struggling with the policeman, and Hank making a rapid getaway.

"THE BAD MAN'S CHRISTMAS GIFT."—Andy Carson, puncher on the Lazy X ranch, is in love with Gladys, daughter of Col. Pierce, the ranch owner. Gladys likes the young puncher, but when Jack Brinsley, a young Eastern friend of her father, comes to spend Christmas at the ranch, she speedily transfers her affection to the Easterner.

Carson, embittered by his failure in love, broods upon the matter, until his disappointment breeds a desire for revenge, and, to his mother, he threatens the life of his successful rival.

However, his mother tries to dissuade him, and, believing that she has succeeded, gives no further thought to her son's threat. The wedding day arrives, and after the ceremony the guests are assembled at supper in the ranch house, when Carson rides up, and slipping to the open door, fires at Brinsley, fortunately missing him.

He is gone before a pursuing party can be formed, and although they strongly suspect him of the attempted murder, there is no proof. Carson, determined to make sure of his vengeance the next time, waits for a favorable opportunity.

It comes Christmas Eve, when Carson is sure that a large party will be at the ranch house. However, he knows that the Sheriff is keeping a close watch upon him and that any attempt will be frustrated by the vigilant officer.

His first move, therefore, is to get the Sheriff out of the way, and going to the office, he leaves a note reading:

"I missed my man at the wedding, but will get him next time." He then conceals himself, and has considerable amusement over watching the officer read the note. He then covers the astonished man with his revolver, disarms him, and forces him to shackle himself. Placing a cigar in the helpless man's mouth, he lights it for him, laughs and goes out.

At the Last Chance Saloon the cattlemen are planning their Christmas celebration. One of their number is to impersonate Santa Claus, and carry the gifts to the Lazy X Ranch. Carson enters the saloon and hears their plans, but they do not invite him to participate, for he has made himself an outcast among them by his recent actions. However, he sees a splendid opportunity to carry out his threat, and slipping away, he hides and waylays "Santa Claus" at a lonely corner of the corrall, forces him to take off his costume and locks him in a shed.

Arrayed in the Santa Claus garments, and carrying the sack of presents, Carson goes to the ranch house, intent upon murder. Upon one package addressed to Brinsley, he writes, "To-night is the Night."

The Sheriff, released by a chance visitor to his office, hastens to the ranch house to warn Brinsley of his danger. Carson, as St. Nick, arrives, distributes the presents, and is taken by all for the ranchman who had been chosen to play the part. Brinsley's present, with the ominous warning, is handed out last, and the young Easterner, never suspecting Carson's real identity, confides in him, to the extent of allowing Santa Claus to examine his revolver and make sure that he is prepared for defense.

Carson had many opportunities to kill Brinsley, but the Christmas spirit is mastering his desire for revenge, and time after time he stays his hand. Suddenly another guest arrives, in the person of Carson's mother, who has heard of her boy's action at the Sheriff's office and has come to find him. Even she fails to recognize him, but her presence there is the last straw that is breaking his desperate resolve, and Carson, thoroughly repentant, and bad man no longer, throws off his disguise, and confesses to his entire plans. The Sheriff is determined to arrest him, but Gladys, her father, and even Brinsley, speak against his marring of the Christmas festivities, and Carson, grateful, joins the hands of Brinsley and Gladys with the words, "This is my Christmas gift to you."

The next day the whole family makes ready to meet the nephew at the station, but they are disappointed to see that the nephew looks poor, for they understood he was a rich man. They force him to sit with the coachman and at the house he must eat his meals in the kitchen and sleep in the attic.

In the company of Maggie, he soon learns that they are cousins. The following day, they are caught making love. Immediately, Maggie is dismissed, but Jack removes a false beard and says Maggie has promised to marry him and he shall settle on her his vast fortune.

They go away together, leaving the whole family in despair. A year later, we see the young married couple with their little baby living a happy life.

"THE KINGDOM OF FLOWERS."—A series of hothouse flowers in elaborate vases turning upon a pedestal. The stereoscopic effect will excite as much comment as the perfect coloring.

" CAIN AND ABEL."—And in the process of time it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord.

And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof. And the Lord had respect unto Abel and to his offering.

But unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect. And Cain was very wroth and his countenance fell.

And the Lord said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen?

If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door: and unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him.

And Cain talked with Abel his brother, and it came to pass, when they were in the field that Cain rose up against Abel, his brother, and slew him.

And the Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel, thy brother? And he said, I know not; am I my brother's keeper?

And he said: What hast thou done? The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground.

And now art thou cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand.

When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.

And Cain said unto the Lord: My punishment is greater than I can bear.

Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from thy face shall I be hid: and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth; and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me.

And the Lord said unto him, Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold. And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him.

And Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Ned, on the east of Eden.

"THE OLD HOME."—A lesson in faithfulness. A young man is unexpectedly advised that a mortgage is resting on the old home which he has inherited from his parents. He lacks courage to meet the necessary hardships in order to save the home from being sold and leaves it and his love for parts unknown. His old servant, who has been in his father's family for years, at this point steps in and states his intention to assist the girl in raising the money to clear the debt. The wanderer returns and finds everything paid and is profuse in his thanks to his fiance and the old servant.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.

"THE TYRANT OF FLORENCE."—The excesses of which the tyrannical rulers of byegone days were capable are scarcely credible in these times; yet incidents such as that which forms the subject of this interesting film were not uncommon. The Podesta of Florence, full of a sense of his own dignity and importance, issues an edict that everyone must salute his hat on pain of death. The headgear is placed in a prominent position, and the edict posted up beneath—quite oblivious of the fact that in those illiterate days very few people could read. Lazaro and his family transgress the edict, of which they have not heard. They are arrested and brought before the Podesta. Husband and wife are sentenced to death, the daughter, with the irresponsibility of tyrants is reprieved. She becomes in due course a great singer, and is summoned before the Podesta. Infatuated, he entertains her, and she seems to encourage him. Her purpose is to introduce poison into his cup and so avenge the cruel sentence on her parents.

"A CHAMOIS HUNT."—Shows in a wild and beautiful mountain setting an exciting sport, not unattended with danger. A herd of chamois, disturbed by the beaters, flits across the rocky slopes and falls beneath the guns of the marksmen. To collect "the bag" is a difficult task, as some fall in almost inaccessible places. Nevertheless, an immense haul is taken by the sportsmen.

The chamois is the only antelope found in Western Europe and forms the type of a goat-like group of that family. It inhabits the Alpine regions, central Europe and the Caucases to the Pyreness, frequenting the wildest and most inaccessible peaks in either of these mountain ranges. Most of the summer it spends above the snow line and during that season it shows its dislike to heat by choosing its feed grounds on the northern slopes. It is only in the winter that it may be found in the wooded districts that immediately succeed the region of glaciers and can be successfully hunted. The little animals are exceedingly shy and their senses, especially sight and smell, are extremely acute. A herd never feeds without having a sentinel posted on some suitable prominence to give notice of the approach of danger, which is done by stamping on the ground, and giving a shrill whistling note which warns the entire herd. In the picture we watch a herd thus alarmed and each seeks safety in the most inaccessible situations, reaching them by a series of astounding leaps over crevasses up the faces of almost perpendicular rocks and down the sides of equally steep ravines. As in our picture, chamois shooting is most successfully carried on when a number of hunters form a circle around a favorite feeding ground. The circle is gradually narrowed when the animals scent the hunters to the windward and fly in the opposite direction only to encounter those coming from the other side. In spite of the great danger attending the hunting of chamois, it is a favorite pastime among the mountaineers of Switzerland and the Tyrol.

"THE LITTLE SPREEWALD MAIDEN."—This German story, which is the Kalem release for Wednesday, December 21st, is another two continent picture, and judging from the great success of "The Lad From Old Ireland," the German picture will prove one of the best drawing cards of the season.

The Spreewald picture was made by the Kalem Company, part in the Kalem New York studio and part in Germany, on the River Spree, a picturesque section of Germany, where the country folks still wear a characteristic peasant garb. The leading part is taken by Miss Gene Gauntier. As the story runs two American ladies touring through Germany happen on this little Spreewald girl and being impressed by her comeliness and industry offer her a job in America. She consults with Hans, her sweetheart, and though he objects at first, he soon consents when Freda tells him of the large amount of money she is to earn and to bring back to him. So Freda goes to America and we are shown her departure where she leaves on the queer little Spree boat accompanied to the water's edge by her family and half the inhabitants of the village. The story then transfers to America, where Freda has her job as a nurse girl. But it is apparent that she has higher ambitions, for she is learning the language. With the assistance of a good-natured Irish cop, who has the beat in the section on Riverside Drive, New York, where Freda goes to give her little ward his daily outing. Quick to learn and full of ambition, Freda goes to night school and learns stenography and typewriting. Soon she has a good job and has thoroughly ingratiated herself with her employer, not only because of her careful work, but because of her winsome ways as well, and so it turns out one day that her employer proposes marriage. Freda, however, thinks that she is bound in honor to Hans on the other side and furthermore she has long been afflicted with home sickness for the familiar scenes of her fatherland. So she says "no" to her employer and starts back to Germany, but, alas, like most Germans who come to America, she has become so thoroughly Americanized that she is a much better American than a German and when she sees the primitive life of her own people and when to cap the climax she finds that Hans has been courting another German lassie she decides that America is good enough for her and back she goes to her old job in the office which, however, she does not hold very long, for her employer again makes his offer of marriage and is this time heartily accepted.

The German scenes of this production taken along the River Spree are as beautiful as has ever been shown on this side. The action has such a fine spirit of comedy and such a strong appeal to the patriotism of the Americanized German will doubtless prove one of the biggest drawing cards of the year, particularly in communities where there is a large German population.

"WHEN LOVERS' PART."—Those who remember the Kalem picture, "Her Soldier Sweetheart," will be glad to hear that the Kalem Southern Stock Company has produced another story along the same lines, "When Lovers' Part," is the title and the story is laid at the same period, i. e., just before the opening of the War of the Rebellion. A high-spirited young girl is parted from her lover by an obdurate father. She attempts to elope, but the plan is frustrated and she is deprived of even the privilege of seeing her sweetheart again. Then both father and lover go to war. The father to be killed and brought back in a casket draped with the Confederate flag, while the lover returns at the close of the war full of honors to claim the little girl as his bride.

"When Lovers' Part" is set in real Southern scenery with fine old colonial houses, rose gardens and moss-ladened oak trees as backgrounds. The setting is one of the most superb of the new Kalem Southern releases.

WHO'S THE KNOCKER?

The following editorials appeared on the same date in The Evening Sun and The Globe, both published in New York:

(From The Sun.)

THE PASSING FILM.

The recent loss of interest all over the country in the moving picture shows has been followed by the formation of a new theatrical circuit, evidently intended to attract the public which has for the past few years supported them. At this season the patronage of amusements is likely to be somewhat lukewarm. The approach of the holidays turns the thoughts of theatregoers to other means of spending their money. It may be that the picture shows are merely languishing on that account, but apparently the theatre managers who have formed the new circuit are confident that the pictorial entertainment has lost its charm.

There were several reasons why the vogue of these flittering views should not last. It was inevitable that the taste which delighted in them should ultimately be educated to a point which required something more elevated. That has always been the history of theatricals. Persons brought to an appreciation of the theatre by cheap priced performances come after a while to demand something more satisfying. So from the audiences of the popular priced theatres grew the future audiences of the regular playhouses.

Evidently this evolution is already completed in the moving picture public. The magic lantern has ceased to delight. A certain public is still pleased to see the real events that happened in other places, but for the plays acted especially that they may be reproduced in the films there is much less tolerance to-day. The addition of vaudeville performers to the picture shows was the first sign that the views alone no longer satisfied.

So the people's theatre is once more to be returned to the spoken stage. To win back these spectators a scale of prices will be adopted little in excess of what the picture theatres have demanded. In this particular lies the essential element of any playhouse really of the people. Probably it was their cheapness which first gave the moving pictures such a wide vogue.

So the theatre managers who are going to offer plays at about the same prices as the moving picture men have been demanding seem to have found the right moment.

(From the Globe.)

A WANING FAD.

The moving picture show, which practically took entire possession of the "ten, twenty and thirty" field a few years ago, and later created a new five and ten cent field of its own, appears to be going the way of most mushroomlike fads. A loss of interest in moving picture shows is said to be apparent all over the country. That this will be good for the public's eyes, if it has no other benefit, is probable. A well made film in good condition is not particularly hard on the eyes. but a very considerable part of those shown in the cheaper theatres are in so dilapidated a condition that a constant watching for any length of time is noticeably trying.

In so far as the moving picture has been used for telling wholesome stories, presenting little artificial dramas of real life, it has served a useful purpose. It is probably the cheapest form of dramatic entertainment ever devised, and hence has educational elements of great value. Too often, however, it has been used for presenting unwholesome if not positively immoral or unmoral pictures, and while the net result of the fad has probably been good some of its features have been quite the reverse.

As one of the standard vaudeville features it is likely to hang on, but as a complete show in itself, except perhaps of the five cent type, its popularity is gone, if the judgment of the managers of the new "cheap show" circuit is to be relied upon. Their proposition is, apparently, to use the moving picture theatres for presenting vaudeville, or something approximating it, at prices little if at all above the picture show rates.

The articles are interesting only because of the singular unanimity of thought and purpose, which indicates that they were written, probably, by someone with an axe to grind and express a wish that is father to the thought.

Of the conditions mentioned by the writer the contrary is true. Throughout the country larger and better theatres are being built for the exclusive exhibition of pictures to accommodate the increasing audiences and the demand for better houses for pictures. Whatever falling off in attendance there may be it is incident to the holiday season at which time all amusements suffer from lack of attendance.

The Evening Sun writer disproves his own argument in the statement that theatre managers will offer plays at the same prices as motion pictures. The fact is that the producers of the cheap melodrama have found it impossible to do business on the old basis in competition with motion pictures and are now trying to edge in by cutting their prices. This is clearly a confession of weakness and defeat.

What next?

ANOTHER PHOTOPLAY THEATRE FOR BALTIMORE.

A motion picture and vaudeville theatre to be known as the Cosmopolitan theatre will be erected on Baltimore street, near Greene, Baltimore, Md. According to the proposed plans, which are being prepared by Architect J. E. Kubits, the structure will have a frontage of 30 feet by a depth of 120 feet. It will be one story high, of pressed brick, trimmed with ornamental stone. The facade will be of fancy marble, and lighted by incandescent electric lights. The flooring will be of concrete.

Managers Like Simpson's Solar Screen.

The Simpson Solar Screen is proving to be a great boon to the managers who wish light houses. The inventor has heard many good reports from all directions from those who have installed the same, who are unanimous in its praise. The Educational Alliance, East Broadway and Jefferson St., New York, has just placed its order for one, and numbers of others are coming in daily.

Many exhibitors thought they could obtain the same results with other and cheaper devices, but in the end, they all turned to Simpson for a real, light auditorium during the projection of pictures.

tures as an aid to the work of the public library in that city.

To quote from the Madison "Democrat," of Sunday, Dec. 4: "The principle back of the story telling hour is, of course, the theory that the child who has heard a story from one of the children's classics will be led to read the classic itself. Few stories that simply amuse are told. Every story is told with the thought that it will lead to the reading of some book. With this same principle in mind Miss Smith of the Madison free library is introducing into the library the use of the motion pictures.

"Yesterday afternoon at 2 o'clock a motion picture show was held in the auditorium of the library. Admission was by tickets which had been distributed to teachers and pupils of the seventh and eighth grades of the public school. Miss Weil, the children's librarian, first told a simple version of Launcelot and Elaine, explaining that the pictures soon to be given would illustrate the story and explaining also that this story as well as other stories of a similar nature, could be found at the loan desk in the children's room. Then for twenty minutes the motion pictures portrayed the leading scenes of the story, the background of scenery and the costuming of characters being in perfect harmony with the spirit of the theme.

"Miss Harriet Imhoff then outlined the story of Oliver Twist, explaining what the book was, who the author was, and that the book as well as other books by the same author could be obtained in the library. For twenty minutes following, the story was retold by the motion picture apparatus.

"Both stories were told in the pictures in a way that must necessarily interest the child in these two pieces of literature. Should the effects of the hour in the library mean nothing more than a conception of the two stories told, the returns would be worth while. It is found, however, that many of those who see these pictures go to the desk to learn more of these stories and of other similar stories.

"The difficulty that faces the continuance of this line of work is the scarcity of films exactly suited to the purpose. There are many films of great general educational value. There are a considerable number that deal with literary topics. There are not, however, a great number of films that are well suited to be shown to children and which will have the effect of interesting those children in the best literature.

"M. S. Dudgeon of the state library commission is watching the development of the idea with great interest. He feels that if it is a success here it can be introduced in many libraries of the state, that motion pictures may prove a new and effective aid in library work everywhere.

"J. E. Sherwood, of the Fair Play, furnished machine, films and operator and is much interested in the movement. He believes that this use of motion pictures opens an entirely new field for motion pictures, and that the manufacturers of films will respond by producing many high grade films founded on standard literature."

I am indebted to Manager Sherwood for the clipping and other information connected with the new movement. He informs me that exhibitions will be given every Saturday in the public library auditorium, and that the pictures will be furnished by the General Film Co., at 85 Dearborn street, this city.

Much is expected from the Vitagraph Co.'s "Tale of Two Cities," soon to be released, and it is eagerly hoped that licensed manufacturers will be able to produce a sufficient number of this type of film for library use.

Mr. Sherwood also writes that, through Mr. Dudgeon, he has arranged for such exhibitions shortly in the public library at LaCrosse, Wis., where the Bijou, another theatre owned by Sherwood and McWilliams, is located.

This further broadening of the mission of the motion picture cannot fail to enlist an ever increasing interest in the exhibition of pictures generally, and that means a steady growth in the attendance at picture theatres throughout the country. Every week that passes brings with it a more pronounced demand for roomier and more modern picture houses. With the expansion of the motion picture's influence, let us provide it with more appropriate and worthy temples, so that it may continue to flourish and unfold its beauties to all, irrespective of class or condition.

Novel Moving Picture Statistics.

The "Bulletin" of Bloomington, Ill., in the issue of Dec. 11 had some novel statistics concerning the picture shows and their audiences in that city. Following is an extract from the article:

Is Bloomington "theatre mad?" A conservative estimate of the average daily attendance at the 5-cent theatres in Bloomington is 5,000 people. Of these many may be termed as "repeaters," that is, they attend two theatres the same evening. About $350 is spent every day in the "nickel" shows in Bloomington. Estimating that the 5,000 people who go every day, spend an hour at the theatres, which is small enough to allow for the repeaters, then 5,000 hours are spent every day, or 208 1-3 days, or nearly seven months. If one man had to put in the time spent by theatre goers in one month of thirty days and took the usual ten-hour working day in which to do it, it would take considerable over 40 years of his lifetime. From these figures the man who is opposed to "spending time so foolishly," as some express it, could well say that theatre-going in Bloomington alone wastes six lives a year.

GROWTH ENORMOUS.

The man or woman, boy or girl, who goes to the theatre once or twice a week and pays a nickel for an hour or less of entertainment, does not stop to think of these figures. If he did he would grow gray headed and the enjoyment and recreation would be offset by the possible worry that the world is going to the "bow-wows," as well as to the 5-cent theatres. These figures are compiled only to give to the public an approximate idea of the enormous extent to which this line of business has grown during the last two or three years. About $3,200 is spent in Bloomington every week on theatre-going, which includes the box office receipts at the Chatterton and Majestic in addition to those of the five nickel theatres. This brings out an enormous total of nearly $150,000 per year and means $5.00 a head for the 30,000 population of Bloomington and Normal.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Archer T. McMackin, in charge of Essanay's publicity department, has increased in stature about two inches at least within the week. And there is a joyful reason, for Mrs. McMackin has presented him with a baby girl that turns the scales at nine pounds. While other people are making films entitled "Wanted a Baby," or "A Baby Wanted," our friend Mac gets the real thing direct. Here's more power to you, Mac, and long life and happiness to mother and baby.

I. B. Hancock, of Davenport, Iowa, will turn the auditorium of Turn Verein Hall, that city, into a moving picture theatre Monday, December 19. He was in the city last week and arranged with the American branch of the G. F. Co., 77 S. Clark street, for service. He also purchased an Edengraph machine and supplies.

E. E. Fulton, Western manager of the Lubin Company, is arranging to have a special day set apart for the exhibition of advance releases for the benefit of exhibitors. Mr. Fulton has fitted up a private projection room in his offices in the Northwestern Building, corner Lake St. and 5th Ave.

Manager Gage, of the LaCrosse Theatre, LaCrosse, Wis., was in the city last week arranging for licensed service. The LaCrosse is a legitimate house, playing road attractions, but owing to the difficulty in securing satisfactory bookings, Manager Gage has arranged to fill in the open nights with moving pictures.

Jacob Moelk, owner and manager of the Lyric theatre, Stoughton, Wis., has left the "independent" ranks and arranged for a licensed service at 85 Dearborn St. last week. Mr. Moelk was using the licensed service some time ago and was enticed to the "independent" fold, but he now says he cannot see their service with a microscope.

THE SEASON OF INCONSISTENCY.

SUGGESTED BY POLICE CRUSADE IN CHICAGO.

W. N. Tiffany and H. B. McKown, owners of the Grand theatre, Platteville, Wis., who have been using "independent" service for some time, have rejoined the licensed camp. They are getting service at 85 Dearborn street. They found that their patrons would not stand for the "independent" product.

A. W. Parker, who has just purchased the Alcazar theatre, Pontiac, Ill., from N. J. Hanley, of that city, visited the G. F. Co.'s offices at 85 Dearborn street last week and arranged for licensed service. The house formerly ran "independent" product. Mr. Barker also purchased a Motiograph and supplies. He has changed the name of the theatre to the Photoplay.

Schuemann & Mohrdick, owners and managers of the Cupid theatre, 4043 West Madison street, came over from the "independents" Monday, December 12, and the service is now furnished by the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co. They are paying for a good average licensed service. They state they could not do paying business with "independent" film.

I have just learned that my old friend, Martin Lehman, part owner and manager of the Orpheum theatre, Kansas City, is about to open a fine new picture theatre in that city. Manager Lehman will confine his entertainment strictly to motion pictures and music. The service will be furnished by the Yale branch of the G. F. Co., Kansas City.

Wm. H. Bomb, assistant manager of the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co., at 435 North Clark street, was formerly in charge of the outside city work for the George K. Spoor Co. Mr. Bomb is considered a capable and efficient man in his business.

Herman Goldberg, manager of the Medora theatre, 4238 West Harrison street, this city, who formerly used "independent" service furnished by the H. & H. Co., started with licensed service Monday, December 12. Their trade kept falling off and to save themselves they applied to the G. F. Co., at 435 North Clark street, for service.

Jones, Linnick & Schaefer have purchased the Star theatre, on Milwaukee avenue. The Star formerly showed vaudeville, using the Kinodrome service. This service will still be retained, only that the picture service will be considerably improved. The late Mr. Kohl, of Kohl & Castle, formerly ran the Star, which is a fine theatre seating 1200 people.

The Spoor branch of the General Film Co. took on the Pruyn Bros., of the Electric theatre, Lodi, Wis., Monday, December 12. The electric is a new theatre and the Pruyn Bros. took their present service on the recommendation of Kit Franklin, manager of the Electric theatre, Columbus, Wis.

The Y. M. C. A., 153 LaSalle street, this city, has engaged a series of educational pictures from the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co. for their three days' motion picture exhibition, which commenced Wednesday, December 14. A complete Kinodrome service was used. If successful, similar exhibitions will be given throughout the winter. The Y. M. C. A. auditorium seats 1200 people.

F. H. Salkin, manager and owner of the Sheridan theatre, 935 Irving Park boulevard, this city, opened that house Saturday, December 10, after a thorough overhauling and remodeling. He is getting his service from the Spoor branch of the G F. Co., a high class one at that. Manager Bell tells me that this is one of the best contracts closed recently by his branch of the G. F. Co.

Mrs. E. Giesler, owner of the Little Plaza theatre, 316 North avenue, has left the "independent" ranks and has arranged for service with the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co.

Wieting & Bana, owners of the Electric theatre, Sturgeon Bay, Wis., arranged for a greatly improved service with the G. F. Co., at 435 North Clark street, commencing Monday, December 12. This is the second time within the last two months that they have improved their service, and they give as a reason that every additional increase has afforded great satisfaction to their patrons, and given fine results at the box office.

The Foster theatre, Foster and Evansville avenues, installed a complete Kinodrome service last week.

NO PICTURES FOR CHILDREN AFTER 9 P. M. SAYS READING MAYOR.

Although the motion pictures have been strictly censored, and there seems to be nothing to cause parents to feel that the morals of the children will be injured in any way, Mayor Rick, of Reading, Pa., has notified all managers not to allow children in any photoplay theatre after 9 o'clock unless accompanied by their parents. The mayor claims this will not only help the photoplay manager and cause him less censoring by those who are against such amusement, but it will keep the police from being called upon to look for children who are out late at nights. The managers are much pleased with the mayor's orders and will see that they are enforced.

SHOW PICTURES OF PANAMA CANAL.

Interesting motion pictures of the Panama Canal were exhibited last Thursday afternoon before the Woman's Welfare Department of the National Civic Federation, which held its first of a series of lectures on "The Growing South," at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York City. The pictures, which were taken by Claude N. Bennett, manager of the Congressional Information Bureau, of Washington, depicted scenes of how the canal looked at the present time, and also showed the manner and mode of living in that tropical country. All the scenes were ably explained by Mr. Bennett, much to the delight of his hearers. The address on the subject of "The Growing South," was made by G. Grosvenor Dawe, managing director of the Southern Commercial Congress.

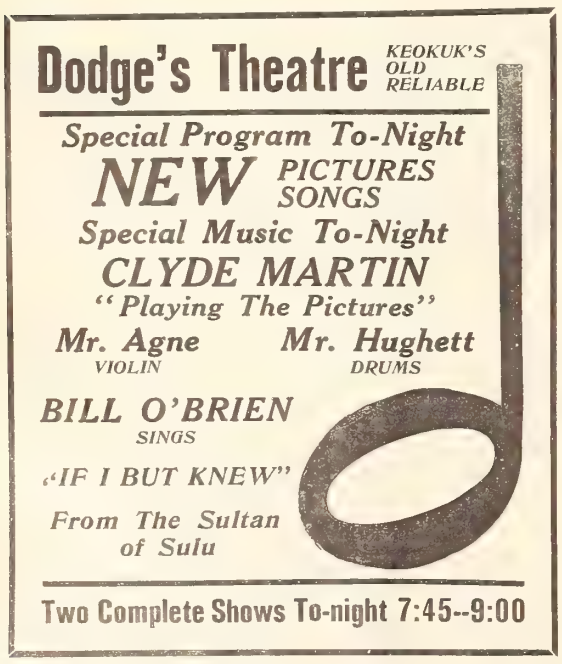
Playing the Pictures

By Clyde Martin

WHEN you take in consideration the number of people that come to your theatre to hear the music as well as to see the pictures, you will agree with me when I suggest advertising your musical part of the program as strong as you do the pictures. Of course, there are things to be considered: if you have run over a certain reel and find it to be a poor production you would not think of using any printers' ink on advertising the same. On the other hand, if you have some good feature picture that will get you the money by using a few inches in the local papers, you will take a chance and boost that certain picture. It is the same thing with your music, if your musicians are making good with your patrons, they are as much of a drawing card as the pictures and should have their share of publicity.

Advertising is the life of any business if used to the best advantage, but poor advertising is worse that none at all and only proves a detriment to your business. If you have good musicians, people who are playing the pictures boost them the same as you do your pictures and you will soon find it will mean money in your pocket, for as soon as you start advertising your musicians, the patrons will give more attention to their work, and when your patrons awake to the fact that the musicians are playing the pictures, you will find that you have a permanent drawing card.

The advertising copy on this page is an example of the way the Dodge theatre company, of Keokuk, Iowa, boost their musicians, and I believe their method of advertising in the local papers has gone far towards building up the capacity business that continues throughout the entire summer and winter season.



It is true that different conditions prevail in different towns, and possibly it would be money lost to advertise a picture show in some localities; nevertheless, if you have never tried this method, a few weeks' advertising in your local papers would be an inexpensive experiment and might prove to be the upbuilding of your business.

You will find that the advertising will help you in more ways than one, for if the musicians see that you are boosting their work and featuring the music they will work harder towards playing the pictures.

During the past week I have received a great many letters from musicians and the suggestions and inquiries have been a great help to me as they have brought up many points that often arise in playing the pictures. I think the most important question was in regard to a scene in the Pathe production of "Abraham Lincoln's Clemency." The piano player called my attention to the scene where there is a battle raging in the background and to the front of the picture is the hero who has been mortally wounded. The question was, "Should you continue loud heavy music in keeping with the battle, or soft pathetic music for the death of the hero?" This is a situation that often arises, you will find such double scenes in many pictures, and as a rule I would suggest that you keep your music in touch with the central figure or attraction, but in this particular scene I would suggest that you have the drummer carry out the scene of battle by a roll on the base drum throughout the entire scene, and the piano player play appropriate music for the death of the hero, by doing this I believe it will be as near correct as the scene can be worked out, and I think the contrast in the music should make a very pleasing effect.

Since this scene has been suggested to me I recall a similar scene in the Kalem picture "The Touch of a Child's Hand." In this picture you will remember the scene where the insane father is shown on the porch with a knife in his hand, the audience is in suspense as to whether he is to kill the rich man or the child of the rich man, and the scene shifts several times, first showing the insane man on the porch then showing the interior of the rich man's home. As the scene changes so quickly and often, I would suggest that you keep up the creepy music through the entire scene. The creepy music in this particular picture and scene not only suggests the insane man's intentions when he is shown on the porch, but when the interior of the rich man's home is shown it suggests the danger that is about to befall the rich man or his child, and as they are unaware of the oncoming danger the music makes a great contrast to the scene.

The Kalem release of November 25 "The Roses of the Virgin" is a good example where popular selections can be used to good advantage. In the scene where Pierre's mother takes the roses from the garden it would be very appropriate and pleasing to play "The Garden of Roses," or "Just Like the Rose." Then at the close of the picture where the mother appears before the shrine you will find it will help the scene by playing "The Rosary" until the close of the picture.

In another letter I received last week I was asked to suggest some good music to play between the shows. This question is easily answered. I do not believe in playing between the shows. As a rule the intermission is very short, you will seldom find a wait of over six or eight minutes, during this short time the people are passing in and out and there is usually so much confusion and noise that I hardly believe music would be appreciated. I believe if you will take a rest during the intermission the audience will appreciate your work a great deal more when you start playing the pictures. In next week's article I will devote most of my space to answering the numerous questions I have received in the last couple of weeks.

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"DOUGHERTY."—Words by William Jerome; music by Jean Schwartz; published by Jerome H. Remick, New York. The ability of these two authors is well known and any new selection from them is welcome. If you want a feature set of slides, this is IT. Every slide a novelty, showing in a humorous way how "Dougherty" has succeeded the famous "Dooley," and become the "big bug" at Washington, D. C., and workingman's friends when he is looking for votes. If you are looking for comedy, get this set.

"THE VALE OF DREAMS."—Lyrics by Chas E. Baer; music by Johann C. Schmid; published by Jerome H. Remick & Co., New York. Here is one fine set of slides. The lyrics tell of a loving couple who hold their trysts in a garden whose beauty causes them to dream of all that is beautiful. Wheeler has found that garden, or one like it. His backgrounds for this set are superb and are colored with remarkable vividness. Besides being posed in mediaeval costume, which affords lots of brilliant coloring, the set contains novelties that are winners.

"I'D GIVE THE WORLD TO CALL YOU MINE."—Words and music by Sadie Koninsky; published by the Koninsky Music Co., Troy, N. Y. This author is well known to the music world, and her compositions always make a hit. This one is no exception. The slides are in every way a model love ballad set gracefully posed, beautifully colored, and containing that photographic excellence that has made Wheeler's slides popular.

"GLIDING O'ER THE SNOW."—Words by W. L. Werden; melody by K. V. Bowers and published by the Harold Rossiter Music Co., of Chicago. A very appropriate song for this time of the year. A tuneful melody treating of the joys of sleigh riding. The pictures are exceedingly pretty and the models exceptional ones. Novelties, too, as usual, adorn the set, making in all a set far from the ordinary.

"I NEVER KNEW TILL NOW."—By Chas. K. Harris and published by him. A descriptive ballad by that well known writer and publisher, whose songs always sell well. The slides for this song are exceptionally fine, there being some entirely new ideas in pictorial effect—while new, still beautiful—not merely freaks—a very fine set.

"SHOW ME THE WAY TO FRISCO."—Words by Jack Mahoney; music by Theo. Morse; published by Theodore Morse Music Co. A cow boy song with snappy tuneful music, illustrated with breezy pictures, with fine western settings. The atmosphere of the great West is surely well portrayed in this fine and novel set of slides.

Alfred L. Simpson.

"DON'T WAKE ME UP, I'M DREAMING."—By Herbert H. Ingraham, author of the great musical successes "Hoo, Hoo, Ain't You Coming Out To-night," "Roses Bring Dreams of You," etc. Published by Shapiro. The publisher of this song predicts for it a greater hit than any of its predecessors. This is saying a good deal. In Simpson's set of illustrations is photography of exceptional excellence and coloring of his usual artistic quality.

"COLUMBIA THE GEM OF THE OCEAN."—The song which appeals to the patriotism of every true-born American. Simpson has made the greatest set of slides ever shown to an American audience. An up-to-date series of patriotic pictures, battleships, American flags, and wonderful effects of photography.

Levi Company, Inc.

"CRISTO COLUMBO."—Words by Thomas J. Gray and music by Fred Fisher, writers of "Any Little Girl That's A Nice Little Girl," etc. A fine character song with both clever lyrics and a good melody. The set contains a dozen novelties, all well done and every singer can bank on twelve good laughs every time he sings it.

"TURN THOSE EYES AWAY."—Words and music by Billy Brent; published by Shapiro. Another good song by Billy Brent with a fine set of lyrics and a very pretty melody. The slides are highly artistic in every detail. This song has already made good.

A GUARANTEED POSTER SERVICE.

A great many licensed exhibitors have refrained from using posters to advertise their pictures because of the difficulty of obtaining such posters in time to be of any real benefit to them. Either they are situated in a small town where it was impossible to get posters, or their exchange did not carry a sufficient stock to supply all their customers.

But this is an age of specialties, and posters are now considered a "specialty" by many in the business. The Exhibitors' Advertising & Specialty Co., 105 East 14th street, New York City, in addition to handling everything likely to advertise or increase the box office receipts of a motion picture theatre, carry the biggest line of posters in the country. Everything in the way of A. B. C., Selig, Vitagraph, Essanay and Melies posters, also various stock posters especially adapted for picture theatres, can be had there by the exhibitor. They guarantee to satisfy your wants whether you are in the smallest country town or in the metropolis itself; whether you apply in person or by mail. A regular "Weekly Service" is this concern's long suit.

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS

Published Without Prejudice

NOTE—The editor of The Film Index is in receipt of many letters from various persons on varying subjects—many men of many minds—and finds time too brief to give adequate reply to all. Some of them are worthy of publication. Hereafter all such will appear under this heading from time to time, and if anyone cares to answer or discuss the questions asked, either through the columns of The Film Index, or direct to the writer, our permission is herewith given.

All letters published under this heading are printed without prejudice. In other words, The Film Index neither endorses or criticizes the statements or opinions of the writers. We believe that this is the better way of getting the right information from correspondents.

Who Can Tell Them Why?

Mansfield, Ohio, Dec. 12, 1910.

The Film Index, New York City.

Gentlemen: We are writing to ask how you find business conditions in various parts of the country in the amusement line just now, and why we write is as follows:

Our business is more than one-half less than last year, and so is all other amusements in our city, so it is not the fault of our houses, as we first thought, but afterwards learned from both personal investigation and much correspondence that same conditions prevailed in about every city in the good old state of Ohio, both large and small. What we can't learn to our satisfaction though is: what is doing it? and if you can enlighten us any we certainly will appreciate it. We naturally don't like the way our business has fallen off, but as long as we are not in the least lonesome, we have no particular "kick" coming, but that is not helping much.

We wrote the Moving Picture World and the editor was kind enough to try and convince us that we were in fault, as everybody else to their knowledge was simply burdened with money made in the business, although we sighted him to numerous towns and cities that are worse off than us, and when we suggested that he might be so busy getting out his paper that he had failed to investigate very carefully, he seemed to get rather "peevish" about it, so we knew just as much when we was through with him as when we started.

We learn that other businesses that depend on 5 and 10 cent sales, such as saloons and cigar stores, are falling way short of their regular business, and our retail business is very quiet, so it is not just the amusement business that is suffering. Our exchanges write us that they are receiving complaints from exhibitors every place, so we can't understand why The M. P. World tried to make us think we were lonesome. He quoted houses that were using Independent stuff as the ones who were making money, but with us it is the house where we are showing Licensed service that is making good at all, and our Independent house is barely breaking even just now, although the Indepedent service is not all bad, and from our investigation we don't believe the service has anything to do with the present conditions.

One of our competitors here is showing 15 reels of Licensed stuff per week, and we show 9, which is enough for any house to show in a city of this size. The value of the films that are turned out now make it a shame to only show them for one day, to a few hundred people, and by so doing prevent many hundreds from ever getting an opportunity of seeing them. You dare not show repeaters in this town, as a few who had seen the picture would be sure to howl their heads off, no matter how good it was.

If it wasn't for those conditions there would be hundreds of houses that use Independent now that would be using Licensed reels, as we know we would like to show Licensed service in both our houses, even if the Independent is good, the other is better.

Yours very truly,

CROUSE & KUNZ.

Wants Uniform Bulletins.

Natrona, Pa., Dec. 7, 1910.

Editor Film Index, New York City.

Dear Sir: Pathe Freres is putting to a vote which bulletin is the most popular with the exhibitors, and I wish you would publish in your paper something concerning same, as I think the time is coming when we exhibitors will get some real use for said bulletin. My idea is that manufacturers should get together and issue an uniform bulletin, so we could have the frames made to fit and place same in lobbies, or some other convenient place, for the public to read. I am sure it will help the business, or, if not, will enable the public to understand the pictures better. Some films are very hard to understand unless one has read the story of it, especially if, as sometimes happens, that a sub-title or letter is cut out altogether on a film that is a little old.

I think that the new Essanay bulletin is the most convenient size and elegant in appearance, only in place of synopsis they are praising their product. If Essanay people would print as good a synopsis as Lubin does on his bulletin I think there would be very little room left for complaint.

Hoping you will do something in this matter and oblige thousands of exhibitors, I remain,

Yours truly,

JOHN HAFNER.

Wants Them in the Index.

Detroit, Mich., Dec. 7, 1910.

Editor Film Index, New York City.

In re the controversy regarding the advance notices sent out by the film manufacturers whether a booklet or a bulletin is more desirable. How could a first run exhibitor make an intelligent selection for the coming week, from the meagre description contained on a Kalem bulletin, for instance. The best plan, in our opinion, would be for The Index to reach subscribers by Friday, or better Thursday, containing full story of following week's releases. A bulletin such as Lubin's would then be valuable for lobby display, etc.

Yours very truly,

MICHIGAN AMUSEMENT CO.

Bucking Another "Trust."

Chicago, December 12, 1910.

Editor, The Film Index, New York, N. Y.

Dear Sir: I will ask you as a favor to publish this letter in your valuable paper, as the exhibitors will be very much interested to learn what is going on among the Independent exchanges.

All the exchanges in the city of Chicago and surrounding territories, with the exception of the Chicago Film Exchange, have combined and organized for their own benefit to bleed the poor exhibitor and get as much money out of him as possible.

The rules of the above-mentioned Trust, or combination, are as follows:

First—No exchange belonging to this Trust can take on another's exchange's customers for less than they are paying the other exchange.

Second—As soon as a Trust exchange raises the price on his customers he reports the raise to the Trust, and no member of the Trust can take on the customer for less than the raised price.

Third—The Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company will be instructed to force all the exchanges to join the new Independent Trust.

The Trust meets twice each week, and has already elected officers. Joseph Hopp, a man of the Declaration of Independence and Trust-buster fame, is the president of the new Independent Trust.

The above rules are a few that I have learned of outside sources, and I understand that their main object is to raise the price for service as soon as they have the exhibitor in their clutches, and then no exchange of the Independent Trust will be able to take on the customer for a reduced price.

I have learned from good authority that the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company have already promised and given their support to the Independent Trust.

Mr. Plough, who is preaching anti-Trust, is an officer of the above Independent Trust, and has made a strong assertion that he would raise all his customers at once if all the members would agree to do likewise, which they did.

I am writing this letter for the benefit of my brother exhibitors and urge them to get together and fight this new Independent Trust before it is too late, and in the meantime, get their films from a real Independent exchange or from the General Film Company, but for their own good, don't support any new Trust.

Hoping this letter will be of interest to all exhibitors, I am,

Very truly yours,

MAX SCHWARTZ,

Manager Annex Theatre, Chicago.

New Announcement Slides.

The Levi Co., Inc., has just put on the market a new line of slides called "Art Announcements." To say that they are artistic is putting it mildly, as they are the most attractive announcements ever seen. Nothing on the screen receives more favorable comment than a beautiful song slide, and when the exhibitors see these new song slide announcements, they will probably agree that it is hardly possible to produce anything more classy. The photography and coloring are excellent. Out of a line of 464 announcements, they have selected for this special line the 12 best numbers that are in constant use and they feel safe in predicting for them a hearty reception.

WATERBURY, CONN, HAS NEW HOUSE.

The Scenic theatre, the latest addition to Waterbury's list of amusement houses, opened its doors last week for the first time and large audiences have been in attendance ever since. The theatre is situated next to the Buckingham building on the Bank street side and will exhibit motion pictures afternoon and evening with a complete change of pictures Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday nights. Walter DeFabritis is manager of the house.

Central Hall, the first building ever erected in Asbury Park, N. J., solely for a church, has been transformed into a motion picture theatre. The cost was $7,000.

The Spring Dell Association, Rutherford, N. J., has been granted a permit to conduct a photoplay theatre on Main street.

Martin Garone is building a first-class photoplay theatre at 76 Catharine street, New York City. The house will cost in the neighborhood of $6,000.

Released Thursday, December 22d. Length about 975 feet

An American Count

Here's a photoplay that will be voted a winner by 100 per cent. of any audience. It is packed and crammed with absorbing interest all the way through. The plot has to do with love, but there is no end of rare fun while the young American is masquerading as a Count to win his sweetheart and cure her of infatuation at the prospect of meeting a real count. After the wedding the real Count appears. He's not an Apollo for beauty nor a Lord Chesterfield for manners, and the girl is mighty glad she is married to her old sweetheart. This is one of the very best of Lubin's high class productions. The settings are excellent, the acting of high order, the actresses have plenty of beauty and style. If you want a warm place in the hearts of your patrons, you can't afford to miss this one.

LUBIN FILMS—CLEAR AS A BELL

Released Monday, December 26th. Length about 980 feet.

Making a Man of Him

A drama of virile interest in which the butterfly son of a selfmade millionaire is redeemed from his gay life by means of a clever ruse conceived and carried out by his father. A story which shows that there is underlying good even in the worst characters, and that it only awaits a chance to show itself. There is solid, absorbing human interest here and it is set forth by clever stage work.

Proof Positive

of the superiority of the BIO Carbon is found in the fact that the increase in sales of BIO Carbons exceeds that of all other makes combined.

The Verdict of the man who uses them is a final and indisputable one, and it has additional weight because every BIO user is drawn from the ranks of those who have tried and formerly used other brands, while those who do not use BIO Carbons have (nine times out of ten) never tried them.

BIO CARBONS

A Bit of History

Three years ago we decided, after a thorough study of the subject, that the carbons then used in America for motion picture production were far from the best that could be produced for the purpose. We believed that the ordinary arc lamp carbons were unsuited to motion picture work and that the only reason the American user had been "satisfied" was that he never had the chance to try anything better.

Our experiments showed that the carbons then used burned like tinder and required a very short arc, needing careful and frequent attention to keep the tip of the lower carbon out of the way of the light from the upper, and to prevent the lower from building up a "teat" and "freezing." The only virtue we found in this type of carbon was that it was so soft that it could be set in any old position and still get some kind of an arc.

In making and marketing a harder carbon, we gained these advantages:

First—Slow burning.
Second—Steadier burning.
Third—Whiter light.
Fourth—An arc requiring less attention and manipulation.

On the other hand, we had two things to contend against.

First—The groundless prejudice against hard carbons, due to the fact that many cheap, impure carbons, containing graphite, etc., had been placed on the market, and operators had been led to believe that the poor performance of these carbons was due to excessive hardness.

Second—The slightly greater skill necessary to use a harder carbon.

We decided that merit would win, and operators as a class would welcome any improvement by which they could secure better results. Our confidence has been well placed, and we have seen the BIO Carbon go forward by leaps and bounds to the greatest success ever achieved by any carbon.

We are especially glad to have proven groundless the fears of many of our well-meaning but pessimistic friends who assured us that the average operator could not be induced to give a fair, intelligent trial to any new article, no matter how good it might be. We have proven that any operator, under any conditions, can by a little care get better results from BIO Carbons than from any carbon on the market, and better still, we have proven that there are thousands of operators who have the fairness, ability and willingness to make such a trial. HAVE YOU?

LEADING AMERICAN EXPONENT OF THE PHOTOPLAY

Published Weekly by the Films Publishing Co., at No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City

BUDGET OF AUSTRALIAN NEWS

Written by Dr. W. H. H. Lane

I HAVE seen the plans of West's Pictures New Theatre, work on which was started October 24, and which will cost about $375,000, and will be the finest theatre on this side of the equator. This theatre is being so constructed that it can be used either for the exploitation of motion pictures, or for the production of grand opera, dramas or any purpose that a theatre is usually employed, but is primarily intended for motion pictures. The seating capacity of this theatre will be 2,400, divided as follows: The ground floor will be seated for 1,800, and the circle, 600, all the elaborate seating having been imported from the United States.

It will be fitted with all of the very latest improvements as regards the lighting, cooling and ventilating of the theatre, being so arranged that it can be cooled during the hot summer months, and heated if required, during the cool winter nights, it will also have sliding roofs and electric fans, etc., and the entrances and lobbys, crush rooms, etc., will have much marble in their fittings. No expense being spared to make it the handsomest and most up-to-date theatre beneath the southern cross. The frontage to Oxford street will be 180 feet, with four exits into this street, as well as into Dowling and Marshall streets, and can be emptied inside of three minutes if required, in case of fire, panic, etc.

This will give West's Pictures, Limited, a permanent home in this city, that in the past has been denied them, owing to having to give up at the Glaciarium for four months of the year for ice skating. All of this now will be avoided, and they will be able to provide for the vast crowds that patronize their ventures, all of which they fully deserve. Not only will they have the revenue from the theatre, but there will be six fine stores with living accommodations, and there will be a large building devoted to residential flats, with all the conveniences of the American flats, with a bit more room in them than is to be found in the average flat in New York, and where you will not have to use, as is wont to be told, folding tooth-brushes, etc., to have room to move about.

I am not so far informed as to whether they will in the future also use the Glaciarium for the usual eight months of the year, but I rather fancy that they will be too careful business people, to leave any loophole open for any one else to get in and reap the reward of the good name that they have established at this large and commodious building, and as they are also the owners and the occupiers of the Bijou theatre, a few doors from the Glaciarium, I rather fancy that they will keep this one going to shut out further opposition, but as to that I cannot say at the present time.

There cannot be the least doubt that Messrs. West occupy to-day the premier position in the motion picture world, and I do not think that there can be any sane man that would for one moment attempt to challenge that position. They have no less than 34 permanent shows in Australia, to say nothing of touring companies doing the smalls, and ten in the British Isles, and are showing to more than 250,000 people every week. They not only deserve success, but they command it as well, and there is no one who wishes them better luck than the writer of these lines. If their luck is as great as I wish them, then they will indeed be fully satisfied with this world's allowance.

The J. D. Williams Amusement Company, and The International Film Exchange.

On yesterday Mr. J. D. Williams, of the above company, concluded the deal for a bit of land in the city of Melbourne, for which he paid the sum of $125,000 on which to build his New Melbourne Colonial Theatre, and for which he has sent you direct, photos of the architect's design for the front, and of which I will have some more to say in a little further on in this article. They have started work with a vim on the No. 2 Colonial Theatre in this city and when completed will be a great addition to the architectural beauty of this city. This theatre will be directly opposite to the No. 1 Colonial Theatre, and will take up the overflow from that house, for it is a matter of push and shove to get into this theatre at the busy portions of the day, and at night you want to be on hand with a rush, if you contemplate getting a comfortable seat, and lucky you will then be if you do. On Sunday nights you want to come to the theatre about one and one-half hours before the doors open and get in line in the queue, and then lucky you will be, if you are not too far down the line to get a seat, and you will hear the barker calling out, "neither seating or standing room, the house is full," and when the house is full from a manager's point of view, then you have indeed got a good house, for as long as I lived in New York City, I never yet saw a street car full, but I have seen them hanging on by the skin of their teeth and that is the way with this theatre on a Sunday night, especially, but it is just as full every night in the week, as on Sunday.

The J. D. Williams' Amusement Company have now a paid up capital of $500,000, and they could just as easily have floated it into a million dollar concern and then have got double that money offered here, so great is the faith in all that Williams takes in hand, and all that he does do, he does well, and seems to "Midas" like, turn everything into gold that he touches. This company is going to build at Brisbane, Queensland, as well and they will have a lot more theatres running before the year is over.

One of the features of the designs of these new theatres, and also in the new front that is to be put in at the present theatre, is the working in the front, in a very artistic manner, the trade-marks of the Essanay, Edison, Biograph, Selig, Melies, Vitagraph, Lubin, Pathe, and Kalem films and in the center is the Coat of Arms of the United States as well as a large eagle with outstretched wings, done in burnished gold and flanked on either side by large statues holding aloft large electric arc lights, the whole ensemble making a very fine and at the same time, attractive front, as well as bold and striking as a whole.

These ideas, but in totally different arrangement, will be embodied in the Melbourne, Sydney, and Brisbane theatres, and I presume will also be embodied in the Adelaide and Berth theatres when they get on to those, which Mr. W. informs me is his intention of doing.

The International Film Exchange has at last come to a decision not to handle any makes of films but the M. P. P. Co.'s products, and at the meeting of the firms engaged in buying and importing films, Mr. Williams, who was present decided that he would have nothing to do with them, as it would put on the market too many different makes of films, and so he withdrew, and I am now informed that an association was formed, that was named the Film Buyers' and Renters' Association, but Mr. Williams is not a member of the same. There are very few of the outside makers or "Independent" products being shown, and the most that seem to be screened at the present time is the Gaumont, and the Cines and Lux, but not many others, now and then one of an odd line.

Spencer Returns.

Mr. C. Spencer has returned from the United States, and his new Lyric theatre is fast approaching completion as far as the bricklayers are concerned. and will be in the hands of the CHRISTMAS greetings, kind friends, Christmas greetings. We are a day or so late, but the sentiment is just as strong, and along with it we wish you a Happy New Year and many of them. This is the season for turning over new leaves and making new resolutions, so it may be supposed that many of you have already planned your resolutions and will open the New Year with a vim and a determination to make the achievements of the year past look like 30 cents.

CASUAL COMMENT

One of the best resolutions that any exhibitor can make is to improve the quality of pictures he is running or the character of show he is offering to his patrons. We believe, naturally, that the straight picture show is the only thing, and that the pictures should be the best obtainable. There is nothing gained in cheapening your service by running old film—film that has been run so long that it is worn out. Among the evils to be corrected by manufacturers and exchanges is this. The trouble now is that the demand for a cheap, or low-priced service compels the handling of film that has really exceeded its usefulness.

Another resolution that should be made by exhibitors is to be more careful of the film. It is not unusual for new film to be almost ruined upon the first run by careless handling. This is caused by worn out machines and incompetent operators. With all the information that is being printed about the proper care of machines and film there should be an improvement in this matter.

EXHIBITORS will be pleased to learn that the demand for uniform bulletins has at last been met by the licensed manufacturers. At the last meeting of the manufacturers that question was taken up and it was decided that bulletins should be of one size—practically the same as a page of The Film Index, about 10 inches wide by 13 inches long. This size lends itself well to the necessities of the manufacturer, and gives the exhibitor a sheet that will make a good display when placed in the lobby of his theatre.

Our suggestion now is that the exhibitors have permanent frames made that will hold three or more of these sheets, and attach them to the walls of their lobbies or in such other places most convenient for the public.

THE coming year promises material advancement in the picture business in every branch. Not only will there be better pictures, but there will be better theatres. The theory that any place in which a few chairs and a machine can be installed is good enough for a picture show has been found to be a mistaken one. New picture theatres are being built that will compare well with those devoted to the legitimate drama. With good houses there comes a demand—an increasing demand, for the best pictures made, which means licensed pictures.

Picture theatre managers who were stampeded to the "independent" ranks by the hue and cry about "trusts," are beginning to realize their mistake and are flocking back to licensed picture exchanges. Those who have not discovered their mistake will soon find their patrons going to the better houses and will have to shut up shop. They will have no other alternative.

TO let this issue pass without saying something about ourselves would be a serious mistake. This is not a prospectus that we propose to write, or even a guess as to what we may do during the coming year. Up to now The Film Index has rapidly improved and kept pace with the other branches of the business. It has been enlarged twice during the past year and, if circumstances require, or permit, it will continue to grow. So far we have endeavored to give the exhibitor a trade paper that would be informing and helpful to him. The calendars and tables of licensed releases, and the descriptions of those releases published every week, furnish information that every exhibitor needs if he would conduct his business intelligently.

The special articles on electricity by Mr. Hallberg continue to grow more interesting as the subject progresses. Mr. Smith's Projection Department is furnishing reliable information on questions that puzzle the operator. There is much guesswork and mis-information being circulated regarding subjects relating to the proper projection of pictures. One of the mistaken notions is properly nailed by Mr. Smith in his department this week. While it is not our intention to attempt to correct all the mistakes made by other so-called authorities on questions of projection and published in "hand-books," we shall call attention to the erroneous statements as they come to us from time to time. Operators will do well to read Mr. Smith's department closely.

Another feature that has attracted considerable attention is the series of articles on "Playing the Pictures," written by Mr. Clyde Martin, of Keokuk, Iowa. Mr. Martin has given this subject much thought and his articles indicate a close study of a question that is becoming of greater importance daily. Music is essential to the proper interpretation of a motion picture; but this does not mean that any kind of music will suit any kind of picture. It will be found, as the subject is purused to its logical end, that music must be written for the photoplay. In the meantime, Mr. Martin is teaching us to make the most of the material at hand, and, at least, not to misuse it.

More might be said upon the subject of The Film Index, but this will suffice for the time. The new features will impress themselves upon our readers as they appear. We ask only that you back us up with your subscriptions; we will do the rest.

PATENTS COMPANY ANNUAL MEETING

The third annual meeting of the Motion Picture Patents Company licensees took place on December 19, and was followed by a dinner at the Plaza Hotel in the evening. All the manufacturers were present including Mr. Thomas A. Edison. This is the only function of the kind, by the way, that Mr. Edison indulges himself in, and despite his 70 years, he enjoys the experience with the best of them.

PURELY PERSONAL

E. H. Montagu spent his Christmas in Chicago. Somehow "Monty" just can't get the Chicago bug out of his bones. He really likes the town.

A. R. Boone, formerly of the Theatre Film Service of Birmingham, Ala., but now actively engaged in promoting picture theatres, dropped in to say "how" to The Film Index, while in New York the other day. He says that business in the South is good.

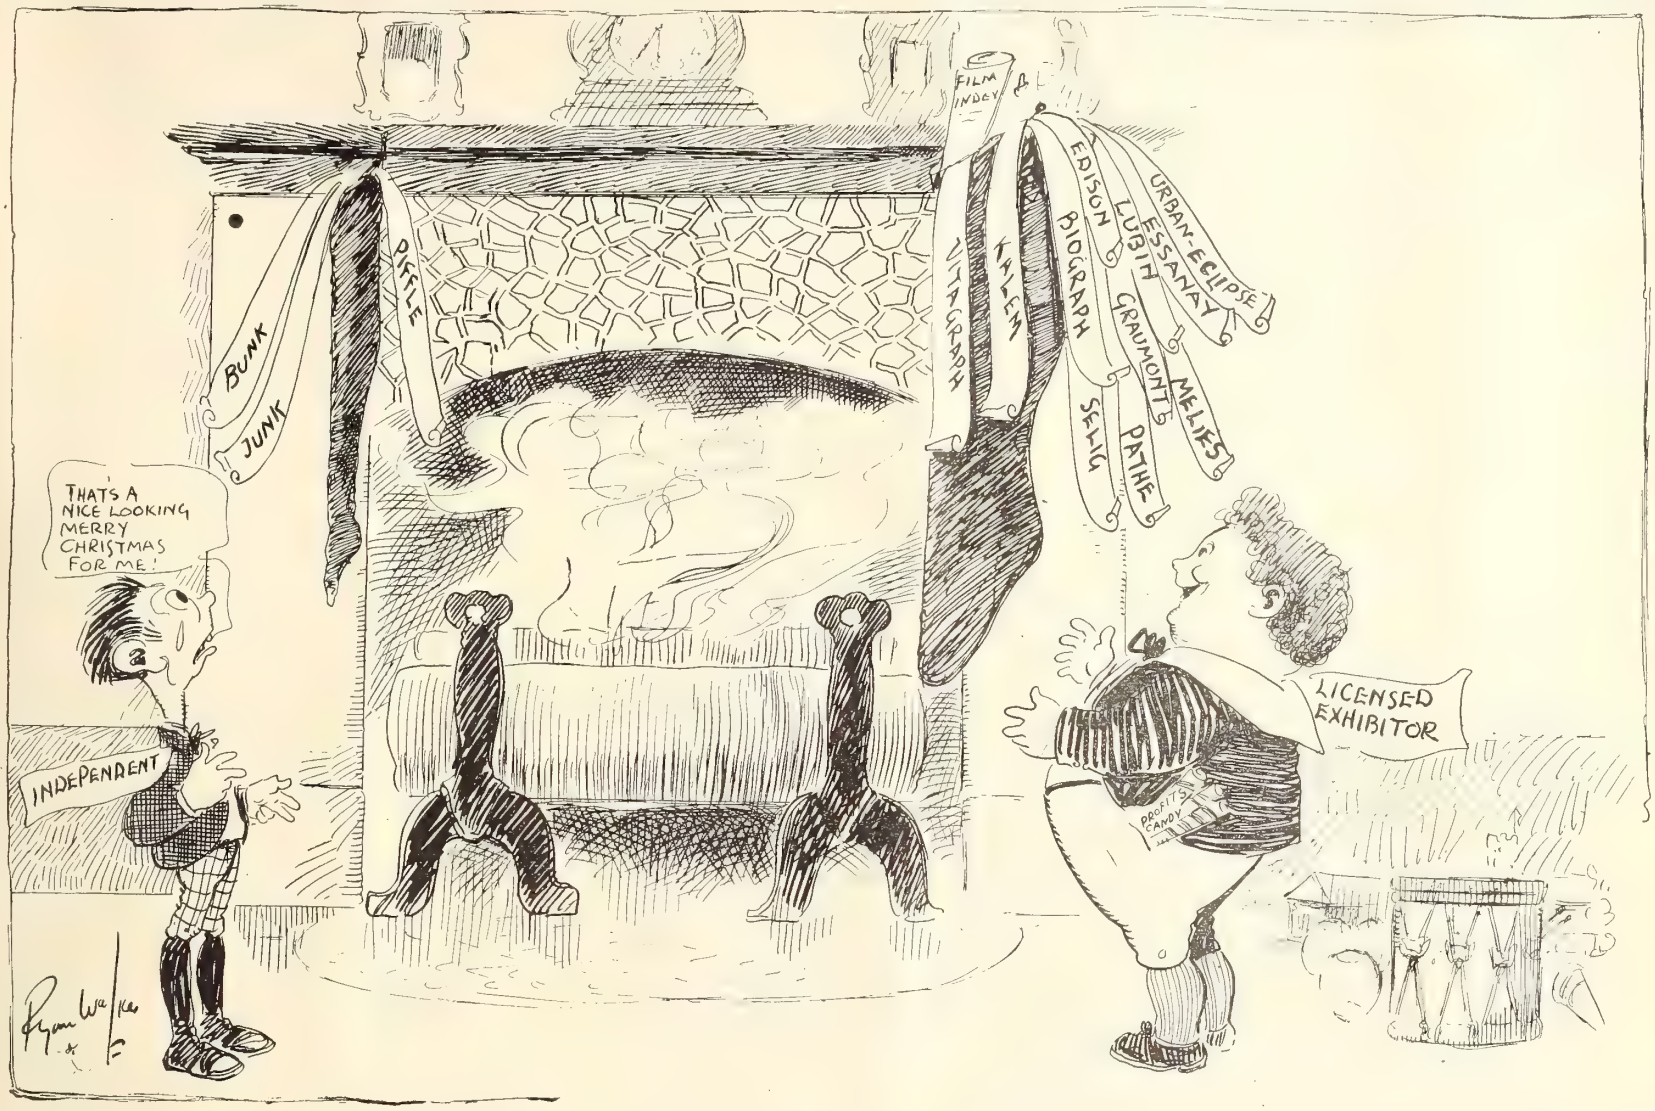
Mrs. Edna Karpeles, assistant manager of the Iris Theatre of Denver, Colo., was in New York last week getting acquainted with the picture men. She made the rounds of the Patents Company, General Film Company, Kalem, Edison and Vitagraph studios, and said that she had a most delightful time. She left New York last Saturday with the intention of visiting "Pop" Lubin in Philadelphia, and nothing further has been heard from her.

Max Katzman is having a photoplay theatre erected at 425 South street, Philadelphia. The house when completed will cost over $16,000.

It is expected that Rome, N. Y., will have a new photoplay theatre in the near future. Rome seems to be one of the upper New York State towns that is not overrun with first-class houses.

MAX SENDS COMPLIMENTS

Max Linder, King of Mirth and Comedy, known wherever Pathe pictures are shown—and that means throughout the civilized world—has fully recovered from his recent illness and sends greetings to his admirers everywhere. In the past, Max has thrown millions into convulsions of laughter by his grotesqueries; his charming manner has won for him a multitude of friends among the patrons of the photoshow. The message he sends is: "I have recovered and am again appearing in Pathe Freres films." Long may he live.



SIXTEEN YOUNGSTOWN OPERATORS PASS

Fire Chief and Building Inspector Put Men through Rigid Examination.

Sixteen motion picture operators, of Youngstown, O., passed the examination given by Fire Chief W. H. Loller and Building Inspector Charles Knox and were issued licenses Dec. 14. Only five failed to gain a passing mark. The examination was required under a recent city ordinance calculated to eliminate to a great extent the danger of fire and to prevent the employment of young boys as film operators.

Chief Loller asserted to a Telegram reporter that he had been informed that young boys were still employed as relief operators in several local theatres and that stringent action may be taken to stop this practice.

The following operators were given licenses: James W. Thomas, S. Bevan, Ole Myers, Gene Welsh, Stephen Goffey, J. J. Pyatt, Isaac Detelbaum, Oreste Olivieri, William Daley, John J. Smith, Ted Kelty, Clyde Rofh, J. Cullinan, A. J. Rochell, Meade Alexander and Homer C. Burr.

Another examination may be given in the near future for the benefit of those who failed upon the first one and for those who have not yet reported.

Chief Loller believes that the action taken by Youngstown council in forbidding the employment of persons under 18 years as film operators may result in state legislation. Other cities are following Youngstown's lead in requiring that operators be licensed.

Williamsport, Pa., has two first-class photoplay theatres, both of which have a seating capacity of 500 persons.

NO MORE CONGESTED AISLES IN LOS ANGELES.

At the last meeting of the City Fathers of Los Angeles, Cal., an ordinance was passed requiring all managers of photoplay theatres to keep the aisles of their houses free from spectators. Orders were also issued to Chief of Police Galloway to see that the new ordinance was strictly enforced and any manager allowing the aisles to become blocked shall be severely dealt with.

In the future, the managers will keep all persons unable to obtain seats outside in the lobby until seats can be found. It is claimed that on Saturday and Sunday nights the photoplay houses are crowded and the managers have considerable trouble to accommodate their patrons with seats.

MANAGER FRANK L. BROWNE RESIGNS.

Frank L. Browne, formerly manager of the Pastime and Beacon theatres, Boston, and since August, general manager of the Old South and Washington Theatres, has tendered his resignation, to take effect at once. The cause of Mr. Browne's resignation from these two theatres is laid to lack of harmony with certain stockholders of the corporation.

J. J. KLEIN WILL BUILD THEATRE.

Another motion picture show is to be installed on Euclid avenue, near East 55th street, Cleveland, O. J. J. Klein, has announced that a building on the north side of Euclid avenue, forty-four feet west of East 55th street, was being remodeled for the purpose. The theatre will be thirty-six feet wide and 175 feet deep and two stories high.

NEW MAJESTIC THEATRE OPENS

Meridian's Newest Photoplay Theatre Has Brilliant Opening—Mayor Parker One of Guests

Of the many notable theatrical events to take place in Meridian, Miss., during the season, it is probable that none will eclipse the opening of Captain W. D. Ament's new Majestic which occurred on the night of Dec. 5th. On that evening the house was packed with the most exclusive of Southern aristocracy, who enjoyed the program immensely.

After a finely rendered overture by the house orchestra, which called forth much applause, Mr. Howard Hoagland introduced Mayor Parker, who, with his family occupied one of the boxes. The mayor, in a graceful address, congratulated the manager and the city of Meridian on the beautiful theatre, and expressed the general wish for its success and prosperity.

After a few remarks from Captain Ament, the large audience was treated to some very high class vaudeville acts and some excellent pictures.

The theatre was most artistically decorated. There were hundreds of brilliantly colored electric lights everywhere, while the stage and corridors were banked with palms and other hothouse plants. In the boxes and front rows of the orchestra were seen many ladies in evening gowns and men in full dress.

It is expected that Captain Ament's new house in Corinth, Miss., will have its opening on the evening of Dec. 24th.

B. G. Wheeler has bought the Jewell photoplay theatre in Dayton, O.

Claude Sheets has sold his motion picture theatre in Escondido, Cal., to J. M. Platts.

TWO GOOD MELIES COMING

"The Crimson Scars" and "Fire, Fire, Fire" A Drama and a Comedy on One Reel

IT is a queer person who has not some time in his or her existence felt a great desire to go on the stage. In childhood days, as a rule, we have dreams of becoming a leader behind the footlights and can see ourselves as great stars, swaying the emotions of the audience from tears to laughter.

Little Alice "The Crimson Scars," is just such a natural child, who loves the stage folks and whose greatest happiness is to have a theatrical picture book before her. But she is poor, very poor. Her mother takes in washing as a means to support herself and little Alice, and Alice is the little messenger who delivers the various baskets of cleaned clothes.

On one of these excursions she stops before the town theatre and gazes longingly at photographs of the various theatre folk. While she is thus engrossed the leading lady appears at the theatre and becomes interested in little Alice. After learning Alice's love of the stage she gives the child tickets for her performance that evening.

Tickled to death, the little girl runs home with the good news to her mother, but the latter, a somewhat arrogant person, chides her daughter for having acted thusly. She takes the tickets from little Alice and invites one of her own friends to attend the performance with her.

Not to be thwarted in her determination to see the show, the girl steals away from home during her mother's absence and goes to the theatre where by stealth she gains entrance through the stage door and hides behind the scnery. A terrible fire breaks out in the theatre. All is confusion. Actors, actresses and stage hands flee in terror, many blinded by smoke or burned by the blaze. The leading lady who had befriended little Alice, rushes to her dressing room, where she is overcome by smoke and undue excitement. Not forgetful of that lady's kindness, the little girl offers her services, rushes to the window and calls for help. By her cries the firemen are attracted, who save both the leading lady and herself.

The next scene shows Alice twelve years later. She has herself become a star, under the guidance of her friend. She has become even a greater one than her teacher, and fame is heaped upon her. She is ever thankful to that teacher, but the latter had Alice to thank not only for her continued success, but for her life. Smoothing back the golden tresses from the fair young brow she kisses a scar on Alice's forehead left their by the fire of long ago; points to another scar on Alice's arm and says: "To these and to you, my dear child, I owe my life."

FIRE! FIRE! FIRE!

The local organization of Suffragettes is in session. Its motto is "Equality With Men." It passes a resolution to demand from the mayor a job in one of the city departments.

"Just in time," says the mayor, "the firemen have gone on strike, I give your organization charge of the fire department."

The Suffragettes are elated, but the firemen can only construe this latest order of the mayor as a huge joke, so if a joke is to be played, they're going to be in it too. They set fire to some brush and send in an alarm.

Now, it is well known that Suffragettes are used to many hardships, but handling a hose is not known to be exactly in their line. Consequently, great is the confusion when they arrive with the engine at the scene of the fire. As one of them later said, "We did our darndest, but there is no getting away from the fact that water is wet, and we girls feel those things terribly."

The firemen's joke worked. The Suffragettes, soaked to a woman, in their endeavor to put out the fire, were cured of the desire to have charge of a city department, and resolved to be just natural women thereafter.

PATHE PICTURES N. Y. CENTRAL EXPLOSION.

With customary enterprise Pathe Freres secured a good motion picture of the scenes at the Grand Central Station immediately following the disastrous explosion of Tuesday, December 20, which wrecked several big buildings and cost the lives of a number of people, injuring many others.

The film was 150 feet long, an excellent photograph, and was greatly appreciated by the audiences of those New York theatres whose privilege it was to exhibit it the same day.

ANSWER NEW YORK SUN'S EDITORIAL

W. H. Kitchell Claims Photoplay Shows are Growing More Every Year—No Sign of "Passing Film"

William H. Kitchell, a writer of picture plays of Newark, N. J., who claims he "was staggered" by an editorial entitled "The Passing Film," which appeared in "The New York Sun" of December 6, answered the same through the Sun's own columns:

To the Editor of The Sun—Sir: I was staggered by the editorial article in The Sun of December 6, "The Passing Film." Is there a "recent loss of interest all over the country in the moving picture shows"? I am in a position to know something of the present condition of affairs in the "photo play" world. In the United States there are about 12,000 theatres using the moving picture, or about 1,500 more than a year ago. There isn't a town in the country large enough to support a weekly newspaper which hasn't one or more houses where "canned drama" is shown. There are exceptions, Montclair, for example, where the pictures are interdicted for some mysterious reason; but the exceptions are not because of any public lack of appreciation.

Are you not a bit "off" in saying furthermore that the "loss of interest * * * has been followed by the formation of a new theatrical circuit, evidently intended to attract the public which has for the last few years supported them," the pictures? New theatrical circuits form and dissolve year in and year out, and occasion no comment in the passing. The present example may find its public, but it has nothing to do with the "photo plays." Cheap melodrama has been killed as dead as Marley's ghost, and certain theatrical interests may imagine there is a chance of a resurrection.

Is there any decline of interest in the moving picture in New York? When and where has the change in popular approval taken place? True, there may be fewer five cent exhibitors showing pictures on the East Side, and because of climatic conditions the open air shows are out of commission, but there are more people and better people looking at moving pictures today in New York than have ever been looking at moving pictures before. The cheap exhibitor is being forced out of business, but men with money and brains who can look ahead are taking his place and building better theatres where better "photo plays" are shown in lighted houses and refined surroundings to the people who appreciate the improvement.

In Newark, for instance, several of the cheaper theatres have been turned back into grocery stores and saloons. Four of this class have gone out of business during 1910. But nine new ones have replaced them, all large and well appointed theatres, devoted to the pictures or to pictures and vaudeville. For a year there has been no Sunday show in Newark, but not one of the better class picture houses has been forced out of existence. There is not only no sign of a letup in popular interest in the "photo play" in Newark, but there is every evidence that the pictures are here to stay. And why not?

Each municipality has its own method of regulating the picture shows, and conditions vary. In New York the authorities are going after the dark houses and the irresponsible machine operator with a vengeance that is working havoc among the cheap exhibitors on the East Side. This is as it should be. There is no excuse for a dark house where unmentionable evils may flourish, and there is no excuse for a ten dollar a week foreigner turning the crank of a picture machine on the ground floor of a tenement containing a hundred other excitable foreigners. These are conditions which exist in few other cities of large population, and it is time Manhattan got busy and eliminated them. But the elimination is not going to put an end to the "photo play" industry.

That the world has taken to the sway of "canned drama" is an undisputed and visible fact to every traveler. Sydney, Australia, for instance, has now eighty-four moving picture houses, with applications before the Municipal Council for eighty-one more. Johannesburg, South Africa, with a population of 70,000, has twenty-two picture shows. There are six in Bangkok, Siam. Buenos Ayres has forty-eight. Winnipeg has sixteen. The world is full of these little inch wide, thousand feet long examples of the universe in motion, and the world appears to be well satisfied with them.

Are these "flittering views" a fad? Is it "inevitable that the taste which delighted in them should ultimately be educated to a point which required something more elevated"? Come down out of the clouds. Did the writer of The Sun editorial ever see a Gaumont scenic film or a Biograph character play or a Pathe pastoral? Was he ever in a "photo play" theatre? Which needs "elevating" the most, the pictures or the obscene and inane musical comedies and "problem plays" seen on the "legitimate" stage? There are seven plays now performing on Broadway which ten years ago would not have been permitted to show for one night in Hoboken. More "elevating"!

Why not give the moving picture a little credit for the good it has done in the world? It has driven the "Nellie the Cloak Model" type of melodrama out of existence. It has provided millions of sensible, hard working American citizens who never saw a problem play or a Salome dancer with a cheap, moral and interesting substitute for these. The evils dreamed of by industrious space writers, of boys led into crime by attending picture shows and the like, are generally dreams and nothing more. True, the posters often seen outside the cheaper grade of theatres are lurid and sensational in the extreme, but they are "drawing cards," and the plays do not come up to the expectations of the seeker of sensation. All "photo plays" are passed before release by the National Board of Censorship, of which many workers for the public good are members. The makers of the moving picture are business men who have made fortunes from the industry and who realize that stagnation means ruin and that progress usually merits a reward. They are employing better actors, making better photographs, and using every effort to obtain better material for the "photoplays." Scenarios that might have been accepted a year or more ago come back to the unlucky writers with blunt and scathing criticism. Actors who fail to make good in the "legitimate" no longer get jobs to pose in moving picture studios. Aud "picture actors" are no longer looked down upon by the "profession." It is a recognized branch of dramatic art, and the up to date dramatic periodical has its moving picture department, with criticisms of current "photo plays" and news of the trade.

If it is true that "this evolution is already complete in the moving picture public," then the "evolution" is a remarkably quiet one and not felt at its vortex of gravity. There is no wail from the manufacturers, the average exhibitor is saying nothing and coining money and the majority of theatres in the United States formerly devoted to melodrama and vaudeville are using moving pictures in the effort to keep out of bankruptcy. The "passing film" is passing, but upon the screen and not out of popularity.

WILLIAM H. KITCHELL.

MUST NOT USE VAUDEVILLE

Should Philadelphia Picture Managers Attempt It, They Must Pay Regular Theatre Licenses

Photoplay managers in Philadelphia, Pa., who attempt to turn their houses into regular theatres that is, in seating capacity—will find out the Quaker City license department will be after them hot-footed. Already two proprietors have been dragged into the net of the law and one of the managers is now held under a bail of $500 to await investigation by the city officials.

The act under which the prosecutions are brought calls for a license fee of $21.25 where the seating capacity is less than 400 for any theatrical or operatic house. For a capacity of more than 400 the license fee is $501.25, of which the city gets $1.25. Failure to comply with this is punishable, if indicted, by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500, in addition to the payment of the regular license fee.

The whole question in the hearing hinged on the capacity of the house. It was testified to by clerks in the Treasurer's office that the capacity was well over 500 and that the required license fee had not been paid. It was also brought out that vaudeville and illustrated songs were among the attractions, thus putting the place in the jurisdiction of the act, as it made it a theatrical entertainment.

In cases of moving pictures being the sole attraction, the state requires no fee, the city, however, charging a fee of $100 annually.

COLONIAL PHOTOPLAY THEATRE SOLD.

The Colonial photoplay theatre at Fourth and Busseron streets, Vincennes, Ind., has been sold by Moore and Dreihaus, of Cincinnati, about six months ago to Charles & Co., of Waukegan, Ill. T. C. Charles, of this company, has been here for several days and thinks the prospects good for a big business at this theatre. Extensive repairs have been made to the front of the theatre. The opening under the new management took place Dec. 1.

The Colonial has always been a popular little theatre. Messrs. Moore and Willis expended considerable on the interior decorations and made it one of the prettiest in the city.

"THE LITTLE OLD STRANGER"

A Symbolic Picture and Quaint Character Study

A Kalem production soon to be released under the title of "The Little Old Stranger," belongs to a class of subjects considerably out of the ordinary and at once commands attention and arouses sympathy. Somewhere in folk-lore we have read a similar story. "The Little Old Stranger" is the embodiment of the kindlier attributes of human nature; he goes about among men stilling the angry passions and pointing out the way to true happiness, and, having brought peace and contentment where strife prevailed, he finally slips away into the unknown from whence he came.

The part of the Little Old Stranger in the Kalem production is taken by Robert Vignolia, and is a delightful character portrayal. Coming out of the mists of nowhere, this kind featured old man takes up his abode with a laborer's family where intemperance, poverty and strife prevail. By kindly admonition and timely interference he works a transformation. The strivings cease and love and obedience comes into that home. His task completed the Little Old Man quietly disappears as he came.

A reverent touch has been given to this subject by the very competent Southern Stock Company which makes the picture an almost living sermon.

SCENE FROM KALEM SUBJECT "THE LITTLE OLD STRANGER."

ANOTHER "GIRL SPY" PICTURE.

The work of Miss Gene Gauntier in the Kalem's "Girl Spy" series has made that young woman and the "Spy" pictures quite famous. Lovers of this series will be pleased with the forthcoming installment soon to be released under the title of "The Girl Spy Before Vicksburg," in which the Girl Spy performs some difficult and daring exploits.

As the story of the picture goes the commander of the Confederate army learns that an ammunition train belonging to the Union army is on the way to the front. It is planned to destroy the train and the Girl Spy is summoned to carry out those plans.

Disguising herself as a Union soldier, the spy joins the train and its convoy and, in an unguarded moment, blows up the wagon containing the ammunition. The explosion arouses the guard, leaving but little time for the spy to escape. A thrilling chase follows through field and forest until the spy is finally overtaken as she plunges into a stream where she sinks from exhaustion, which apparently ends the chase.

After a few moments when the pursuers have disappeared, the spy comes to the surface and makes good her escape. It is said, that in taking this scene Miss Gauntier, who is an expert swimmer, succeeded in remaining under water fully two minutes.

Lots of action, good natural scenic effects and clear photography combine to make this subject one of interest.

BIG HOUSES TO USE PICTURES ON SUNDAY.

Since the Sunday law went into effect, prohibiting the use of vaudeville acts, all the large theatres in Indianapolis, Ind., will give motion picture performances on Sunday afternoons and nights. Such first-class houses as the Grand, English and Park theatres have already given orders to have picture machines installed as soon as possible.

It is reported that Chief of Police Martin Hyland will not interfere with the motion picture performances, so long as managers allow no vaudeville acts, or singers appearing in make-up or costume. Of course, none of the houses will charge admission, but will receive contributions at the door. Part of these funds are supposed to go to charity.

William Daubert and Ira Lee, of Stroudsburg, Pa., have left their home city for Hackettstown, N. J., where they will erect a first-class photoplay theatre.

E. E. Brown, of Hackettstown, N. J., has asked the Town Council for a permit to erect a photoplay theatre in his factory on Main street.

"MIKE THE MISER"

A Messenger Boy Comedy by Edison Players

THOSE who are skeptical regarding the existence of certain tender human sympathies in the heart of a small boy, or whether the small boy possesses a human heart, should see the Edison production soon to be released under the title of "Mike the Miser."

Mike is a telegraph messenger boy and, next to newsboys, supposed to be as near heathen as is possible for a boy to get and still have a standing in the community. But Mike has a lame sister and all boys have a tender feeling for their lame sisters, if they are unfortunate enough to possess one. Upon a visit to the hospital, he discovers that the operation necessary to cure his sister will cost him $50, which to Mike is a lot of money; but he sets about manfully to save it and it was in this process of saving that most of his troubles occurred.

There are other messenger boys in the office where Mike is employed and when Mike fails to join them in their gams of chance, or to treat when his turn comes, they become very much displeased and cap the climax of their injured feeling by tagging him with a card, upon which is written "Mike the Miser." While Mike is on his way, a friendly policeman pulls the tag from Mike's back and shows it to him. As Mike is a good sport, it hurts and he ponders over the offensive card for some time, determining to get even with the fellows that put it on him. Two of them happen along about this time and Mike sails into them, but gets the worst of the encounter by being out-numbered.

This experience does not deter him from his purpose. He now has $39.41 toward the required amount, and things look good to him despite the attitude of his fellows. At this point an unfortunate thing happens; while on an errand Mike steps off a street car and sprains his ankle. This lays him up, but out of his misfortune good fortune comes. For when Mike writes a note to the manager, explaining his trouble and requesting him to hold the job because he needs the money to send his sister to the hospital, the boys in the office get the note and quickly decide to help Mike out. The purse is made up and the four other messenger boys call on Mike to present him with the money. Mike is overcome with this expression of sympathy and there is a general hand shaking all around. As a dainty finishing touch to the scene Mike's little lame sister kisses each one of the boys.

Throughout this picture there is the genuine boyish spirit and natural awkwardness shown in all its reality. Little bits of "business" are done in real boyish fashion. It is a subject full of interest and sure to please.

Sleep, Gentle Sleep.

This rather poetic title would seem to indicate something classic in the way of a picture. It is classy, but of the farce comedy type, and is full of laughs. The trouble starts when hubby gets an invitation to join the old crowd in a little game. You see, he has been married just a year and has spent every evening at home since the great and happy event. Wifie does not take kindly to the idea of hubby going out and decides to keep him at home by hook or crook.

It was a mean trick to put sleeping powders in hubby's wine, but in this case necessity knew no law. Then hubby, looking for a fork in the sideboard, finds the powders and also has an idea—he will put his trusting young wife to sleep so that she will not miss him. She gets it in her tea. The plan works fine both ways; both hubby and wifie fall fast asleep.

While thus under the influence of the sleeping powders a burglar enters the house and makes himself at home. After making an inventory of the silver he comes across the bottle of "doped" wine on the sideboard and helps himself to liberal draughts of the beverage, with the inevitable result.

Morning comes and the servant discovers the sleeping burglar. A policeman is called and the wife and husband come out of their trance in time to give a strong finish to the incident. Throughout the picture bits of comedy are injected which serve to enliven the subject and kep the interest at a high pitch.

ROCK ISLAND HAS A NEW HOUSE.

The Colonial theatre on Second avenue, between Eighteenth and Nineteenth street, Rock Island, Ill., was opened Saturday, Nov. 24, when the public was given its first opportunity to see the attractive little house and the introductory program. At the performances given Nov. 24 which included motion picture films and illustrated songs, besides music by a three-piece orchestra, there were 2,000 patrons. The theatre, which is owned by the Colonial Theatre company of Joliet, and managed by I. N. Martin of Bloomington, is finished in colonial mission style. It has a seating capacity of 500. The booth from which the motion pictures are shown is 138 feet from the screen. It is equipped with the latest contrivances for fire fighting and is so arranged that in case of fire the door of the booth will be closed automatically, thereby shutting off all danger from flames.

E. J. COOPER LEASES CRYSTAL

Well Known Colorado Manager Adds Another New House to List—Has Two Houses at Montrose

Edward J. Cooper, one of the best known photoplay and theatrical men in southern Colorado, has leased for a term of years, the Crystal theatre in Montrose, Colo. The house was leased from Victor Wanee, who will return to Delta, Colo., where he will operate his house in that city. With the Crystal, Mr. Cooper will have control of three commodious houses which will run licensed pictures and high class vaudeville, although it is the intention of the new manager to run first class productions in the Crystal when he can secure the proper bookings.

Soon as Mr. Cooper became manager of the Crystal, he immediately began making repairs. The front of the house is being removed and an open lobby constructed for the box office. The upstairs will be transformed into a balcony, which will have 200 seats. There will also be two tiers of boxes on either side of the stage, which will be handsomely furnished. In the picture booth will be placed the latest model of Motiograph machine.

The new house will be completed in time for its initial opening by the first of the new year. Manager Cooper has not let it become known what he will open the house with, but it is expected that some first class company will hold the boards. The other houses under Mr. Cooper's control, are the Montrose opera house at Montrose, and the Metropole theatre, at Telluride, Colo.

Mr. Cooper has made a remarkable success in the photoplay business; two years ago he same to Montrose penniless; he borrowed $50 with which to start business. Since then he has made enough to get control of three first class theatres, and is upholding the photoplay business in a manner that deserves credit in every way.

A new photoplay and vaudeville theatre is being erected in Roanoke, Va. The name of the house will be the "Electric."

Albert Whitted, of St. Petersburg, Fla., is running the picture machine in the local theatre. Mr. Whitted is said to be one of the most expert operators in the State.

"THE COUNT AND THE COWBOYS"

A Western Comedy by Essanay

JAS. S. McQUADE

YOU can always bet your bottom dollar that when G. M. Anderson produces a western comedy picture, you will get a good run for your money. He has grown so accustomed to the ways and manners of the rough-and-ready, jovial boys of the plains and mining camps that his picture stories of these characters are just about as true to the life and as convincing as are the Bret Harte pen sketches of the far west fifty years ago. And the settings of these western pictures are selected with just such admirable judgment that one fairly lives amid the natural scenes, with all the atmosphere of customs, manners, usages and costumes added.

To the unitiated, the cowboy is ever scooting over the plain on his broncho, or shooting up something or somebody and the public, someway or other always seem to delight in seeing him thus. Mr. Anderson has studied him in other ways. He has observed him in his quieter moods, when he is at home—or all that he can call home. And in "The Count and the Cowboys" he furnishes us a refreshing, mirthful depiction of the cowboy when he gives way to boyish pranks and works a game on the latest importation from civilization.

In "The Count and the Cowboys" I was especially impressed by the subdued nature of the acting, a something not often seen in a western picture. There is scarcely the shadow of a swagger throughout, but there is an easy, natural restraint of manner that amused me by its droll humor. These big, bronzed centaurs of the plain look just like what many of them are—big, healthy boys, full of fun and frolic and intensely against anything that approaches the effeminate.

I never laughed with greater heartiness than I did over the scene where the Count (he is one of French make) is being introduced to the cowboys. As he salutes each of them with a kiss on the right and left cheek, one is fairly convulsed by the expressions on their faces. And then the mock duel scene. I vote this as being about the most mirthful ever filmed. It is just about what might be expected from a lot of care-free, fun-loving dare-devil good fellows.

I take pleasure in drawing attention to the excellent portrayal of the Count by Victor Potel and the equally clever work of Augustus Carney as the diminutive cowboy and fake Count. These picture actors are well known to Essanay picture viewers, as they are respectively the originals of Lank and Hank. Mr. Anderson only appears in a minor role, he evidently having devoted most of his time to supervision and careful detail work.

The opening scene shows Count Castelene driving up, in an old-time stage coach, to the only hostelry in a small western mining town. He is immaculately dressed, including those indispensable articles, a silk hat and gloves. He presents a letter of introduction to the hotel owner, a man of influence, which shows that he has come to look over some mining properties. The Count is welcomed and is at once conducted to the hotel bar, where he is introduced to the cowboys assembled. As previously mentioned, this scene is a big laugh-raiser.

Two of the cowboys constitute themselves a waiting guard of honor to the Count and conduct him to his bedroom. We catch sight of the nobleman's consternation as he compares his tall length with the short bed assigned him, and we see him, too, press down the bed clothes to test the softness of the mattress, only to find that he must sleep on a hard board.

Next morning the Count is seen in the saloon surrounded by his new friends. Things have, presumably, run pleasantly, for he is explaining to them the fine points of the duello and the various thrusts and counters in rapier practice. Just as all present are imitating his movements, the door opens and a new Count enters. This is none other than the diminutive cowboy, Broncho-Busting Peter, who has made a raid on the Count's bedroom and appropriated the requisite wearing apparel.

Pete stalks pompously around the room and gravely kisses his brother cowboys, leaving Count Castelene until the last. He then grabs that shocked individual around the neck and busses him roughly on the mouth. This form of salutation is a deadly affront to the Frenchman, who immediately challenges the false Count to a duel. Broncho Peter accepts, and selects guns as the weapons. In his answer to Count Castelene he informs that gentleman that he has six duels ahead of his and that the Count will be his seventh victim the following morning.

We next witness the scene of the duel. The Count awaits his turn in haughty contempt for the proceedings, keeping his back towards the supposed belligerents. Pete, the false Count, fires his revolver at intervals without either aim or intention. By collusion with his companions, a man falls after each report, and after the fourth shot the Count turns around nervously, just in time to see the fourth man fall. Another report rings out and, as the fifth man sinks to the sand, the Count flees, with the whole band—dead and alive—in pursuit.

The stage coach is just pulling out as he speeds up to the hotel, and he makes a spurt to catch it. Next we see him seated on the back platform of the coach (used for trunks) as it goes rapidly away, and that scene is followed by the mustering of the mounted cowboys and their pursuit and capture of the runaway.

PASTIME MANAGERS BUY THEATRE

Pettengill & Pettengill Purchase the Gem at Arcata, Cal—Will Build House at Eureka Managers Pettengill & Pettengill of the Pastime Circuit of photoplay theatres, operating in California, have recently purchased the Gem photoplay theatre at Arcata, Cal., and have renamed it "The Arcata Pastime." No sooner had the new owners gotten possession than they closed down the house for extensive repairs. The seating capacity will be enlarged to 300 persons, and a new Motiograph picture machine will be installed. Many other changes will be made, such as refurnishing the house, both inside and out.

The Pastime Circuit managers have also purchased a plot of valuable ground in Eureka, on which they will erect another large and handsome photoplay house. This house will seat more than 500 persons, and will be one of the best equipped theatres of its kind along the Pacific Coast. All their houses use only licensed pictures.

The managers attribute their success to the high class pictures they use in their houses; they act as their own censors and do not allow any pictures that would cause comment to be thrown on the screen. They never charge more than a ten-cent admission, and boast that they cater to only the best people. At all performances one can see city officials, clergymen and the elite, together with the masses, enjoying the pictures to their heart's conent.

FOX TO BUILD NEW PHOTOPLAY THEATRE.

Franklin Fox, manager of "Foxey's" photoplay and vaudeville theatre, Goshen, Ind., is soon to erect a new picture house on the main street in that city. The plans call for a theatre of over 800 capacity and when complete it will be one of the most modern in Indiana.

The house will be absolutely fireproof and equipped with a new machine. High-class licensed pictures and vaudeville will comprise the entertainment.

CHICAGO LETTER

By James S McQuade

IN my letter which appeared in the issue of October 22, page 26, there was a list of instructions for actors in motion pictures, said instructions being copied from a printed sheet posted in the studio of the Selig Polyscope Co., this city. Among the rules and suggestions given was the following:

"Use no profanity in the pictures—there are thousands of deaf mutes who attend the theatres and who understand every movement of your lips."

At the time, I little expected that the non-observance of the rule just requoted would have led to the appearance of a sensational newspaper article, under the scare head, "Pictures Shock Deaf in Chicago," and which appeared in the Chicago Tribune of Dec. 14. The article is so important that I give it in full here:

PICTORIAL CUSS WORDS!

This is a lip reader's impression of Chicago's majority of picture shows.

"Shocking! I am ashamed to repeat what that actor has just said! If the police could have heard that last remark of that man on the screen there they would arrest the manager of this show house."

These are only a few of the comments of an expert lip reader yesterday. The shows he was watching seemed innocent in all respects. Most of those he objected to were of the sensational type and were exhibited in districts where the lovers of that class of "drama" are most to be found.

According to the lip reader's running comment on the show the facial movements of many actors on the screen often betrayed language which went beyond innuendo and suggestion, the police censor to the contrary notwithstanding.

WOMEN ADMIRE; "SHOCKING!"

It was a moving picture drama in a Madison street theatre, and an audience of men and women admired.

"This is shocking! The actor there on the screen has just used an unprintable term."

George A. Schriver, of 3128 Lake street, an expert lip reader, was talking to the reporter for the Tribune.

A visit had been made to several nickel theatres downtown. Lip readers have protested against the use in motion picture exhibitions of language the police would stop instantly if they could hear it. The mutes see it. Watching motion pictures is their chief amusement.

The more sensational pictures, they say, are the worst. Films of this class are being reeled off daily in all except a few smaller theatres in Chicago.

Mr. Schriver interpreted the lip movements as the plays progressed. Although deaf, he can talk. He sat beside the reporter and wrote down some of the picture talk. At times he was ashamed to write it. The lip reader could not catch the full conversation. The characters did not face him always, and at times the enunciation was imperfect or made unnaturally rapid by the machine.

ANGER CALLS FORTH WORST.

But in the dramatic moments, and usually when anger was expressed, the player usually faced the audience and said his objectionable words forcibly and plainly.

At a picture show on South State street a group of moonshiners employed some strong expressions during a plot to kill a man suspected of being a revenue officer. Schriver shook his head when he saw the lip movements and wrote down the words angrily. The language was foul and its kind is barred on the legitimate stage.

On South Halsted street the pictures shown were less choice and some of them abounded in vicious "words." Schriver stuck to his task for the good of his protesting fellows.

"I have watched for this bad talk for more than a year," said Schriver, after the tour. "It does not occur so frequently at it did a year ago. The censoring of the pictures has done a good deal toward improving the talk. There is nothing bad said in the good pictures. The original actors do not seem to realize that any one can understand what they are saying and I guess they just let themselves go. People say that we don't have to watch the lips, but we just can't help it."

The actor who is obliged to resort to cuss words and obscenity in order to simulate certain conditions of mind is not far removed from an insane asylum. At any rate he is not a fit subject for the cast of a picture drama. Let him be squelched.

Picture Conditions in the Philippines.

E. E. Tait, buyer for the Exhibitors' Exchange of Manila, P. I., is now in the city. Mr. Tait left Manila Sept. 17, going direct to Paris, thence to London, and thence to New York. His mission in America is to arrange for the licensed product, and the intentions of his firm are to furnish that product to every exhibitor in the Philippine Islands.

At present exhibitors get their films direct from London, and before the formation of the Exhibitors' Exchange there was no renting establishment in Manila. F. Goulette is president of the concern, and John Maynard is general manager and acting secretary and treasurer. Mr. Tait is one of the directors.

Manila, with a population of 250,000, has twenty-three theatres. This number Mr. Tait considers too high, as the natives are poor and they form the bulk of the patronage. Americans, Chinese and the Japs follow in order.

NEVADA, MO.—PHOTOPLAY THEATRE, OWNED BY J. E. HAGGARD.

The structures are crude, being built of corrugated iron and a framework of wood, and will seat from 400 to 600, a few having a capacity of 800. Building material is very high, so that these houses cost all the way from $1,500 to $8,000. These theatres are owned and operated by Americans chiefly.

The prices of admission are 5 and 10 cents, the poorer class of theatres charging the former. In some of the better class houses reserved seats for Americans are held at 20 cents. The service generally in use affords two changes weekly, with about 3,300 feet in each. The best theatres have five-piece orchestras, the smaller a piano and violin.

Theatres in Manila are run every day in the week, in the evenings only, from 7 o'clock until 10:30 o'clock. Comedy and dramatic subjects are preferred by the natives and they show quite a liking for western pictures.

Outside of Manila there is little done in the motion picture line, as the people are both illiterate and uncivilized. There is a picture theatre down at Iloilo, on the island of Panay, and another in Cebu, on the island of the same name, both run by Americans, but they have not been successful.

Mr. Tait has been in the Philippines for two and one-half years, to which he moved from Honolulu, where he was the pioneer in motion pictures, being interested in three theatres. Honolulu became overrun with picture houses and for that reason Mr. Tait decided to sell out his interests there.

Mr. Tait is a Chicagoan by birth and will stay with his folks here for about a month, when he will depart for Manila.

Chicago Alienists Favor Pictures for Insane.

Motion pictures will be installed at the Elgin State Hospital, Dec. 28, as a permanent feature by Superintendent Sidney D. Wilgus for the benefit of insane patients. "Only such films as will amuse the patients will be exhibited," said Dr. Wilgus. "I think we shall arrange to get on a motion picture circuit and thus take the views as they come along. I myself will act as censor. What we want is something which will take the minds of the 1,400 patients we have here off their afflictions." "The idea is a fine one," declares Dr. H. I. David, superintendent of the Cook County Detention Hospital, "an excellent one. Anything which breaks the routine of the patient's days and provides distraction from his thoughts of himself and his condition will make for his improvement. I should say that travel pictures, views of simple country life and views of animal life and action would be the best."

"Boy City" Aids Reform Movement.

On Tuesday, Dec. 13, the Selig film, "Boy City," was given a private exhibition in the Princess theatre, Milwaukee, before a specially invited audience comprising municipal officials, the press, Y. M. C. A. representatives, clergymen, members of reform associations, etc. A Selig representative delivered two lectures on the film, one before the presentation and the other while the picture was being run, which made clear to the minds of all present the scope and value of the work carried on among boys by Judge Willis Brown. As there is at present a boy reform movement under way in Milwaukee, the special exhibition was especially timely and everyone commended the film and its object.

Thomas Saxe, of the Saxe Amusement Enterprises, courteously furnished the Princess, operator, lights, etc., for the occasion, and Mr. Cook, booking manager of the Saxe circuit, arranged for the following dates:

Princess, Dec. 22; Orpheum, Dec. 23; Modjeska, Dec. 24; Globe, Dec. 25; Theatorium, Dec. 26, and the Crystal, Dec. 27. Mr. Cook will deliver a lecture on "Boy City" during its presentation in each theatre.

Essanay's London Business Booms.

Robert E. Spoor, who held the position of buyer of films in London for J. D. Williams of Sydney, N. S. W., Australia, for the past three months, returned to Chicago early this month. Mr. Spoor was very successful in his London position, and gave such satisfaction to Mr. Williams that the latter most reluctantly consented to accept his resignation.

J. A. Hayden, formerly manager of the exchange in Sydney, formed by Mr. Williams, was sent over to succeed Mr. Spoor, who has had a flattering offer in this country under consideration for some time.

Robert E. Spoor is a brother of George K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Co., and also of Harry A. Spoor, the popular and successful representative of Essanay in London. He tells me that the Essanay product is high in favor throughout the United Kingdom, and that on

PROJECTION DEPARTMENT

Problems of the Photoplay Operator Discussed and Questions Answered

Edited by Will C. Smith

LOCATION OF MACHINE.

L. & T. Mgr., New Bern, N. C., writes:—We are building a motion picture and vaudeville theatre here and, according to present plans, our machine booth will be located on one side of gallery, next to wall of building, and about 40 feet from the curtain. Kindly advise through your columns in The Film Index if the projection will be as good from the side of the building (at an angle) as it would be straight on a line in front of gallery.

Answer:—The projection would not be as good from the side of the gallery as from the center of the gallery (on a straight line) unless you could arrange to have your screen on the same angle as your machine. If your machine is sitting on the left hand side of the gallery your picture will be larger at one end than at the other. To remedy this you move the side of the screen nearest to you out a little so that your screen will be on same angle as machine, then your picture will be the same as if you were working directly in the center of gallery. Should you have your machine on the right hand side of gallery, then you want to bring the side of the screen nearest to you in a little, so that your screen will be on the same angle as machine, but I would suggest that if you have not built the booth for the machine on the side of the gallery, to have it put in the center of the gallery on a direct line with the screen, then when you raise and lower the screen for vaudeville it will not effect the pictures, while if you had the machine on the side of the gallery it would effect the picture as above stated, unless you could arrange to have the screen set as I suggested. All machines pertaining to projection work should be set in the center of gallery by all means, especially when the screen is raised and lowered for vaudeville, as the best results are accomplished.

DISSOLVERS.

J. B., New York, writes:—I am using an Edison double dissolving machine and do not seem to get good results with the slides; that is, the dissolvers do not cut good and clear. They do not seem to blend as I have seen some do. Can you help me out? Also, tell me how to set the dissolvers. I am using the Iris dissolvers.

Answer:—To eliminate the disagreeable effect on the screen by dissolvers not cutting clear, your dissolvers should be set perfectly, and to get perfect effect one view must dissolve into the other and can only be obtained by diminishing the illumination of one image in the same ratio as the other is increased without cutting off any part of either view until one is fully illuminated and the other has disappeared. This is accomplished instantly or slowly, depending on the rate of speed with which dissolver is worked. In setting dissolvers be sure that one is perfectly closed and the other entirely open and by moving rod attached to dissolver, up or down, closes one and opens the other, and the results are a gradual blending of one image into the other.

STORAGE BATTERY AND RHEOSTAT.

Stonington, Me., writes:—What volt rheostat could be used on special storage battery voltage? Our storage battery on open circuit (while not charging) stands at 75 to 80 volts. While in process of charging (or in other words, while dynamo is running), which will be the conditions under which pictures are being shown, the voltage is 80 to 90 (average 85). The battery (volt meter) gives reading of 90 plus (even at times 100) when at the end of a charging a bubbling of plates is produced. This settles down in a few minutes, after the generating (dynamo) current stops to 75 to 80 again.

Answer:—The rheostat that you would want to use for your special storage battery voltage is one 52-volt rheostat. Unless you have one made special you will find it rather hard to find a 52-volt rheostat, for the reason that there are only a few places that have the old 52-volt system still in existence, but by taking a 25-ampere adjustable 110-52-volt combination rheostat and connecting one line from your lamp to the outside post of rheostat (right hand side) to your switch and the other line from the lower lamp post to your switch, you will find, I think, that it will work very nicely. The outside posts on rheostat are for 100 volts. Would like to hear further of this experiment as to the results accomplished. I am quite sure this style rheostat if connected properly will give you about 35 to 40 volts across the arc.

CONDENSERS.

Morristown, N. J., writes—Would like to know the focal length of condensers. I am using an Edison model "B" machine and giving a 9 x 12 picture at 68 feet. What size condensers should I have? I have always had a fine picture and now one of my condensers has broken and I want to get the same size. How is the best way to measure condensers?

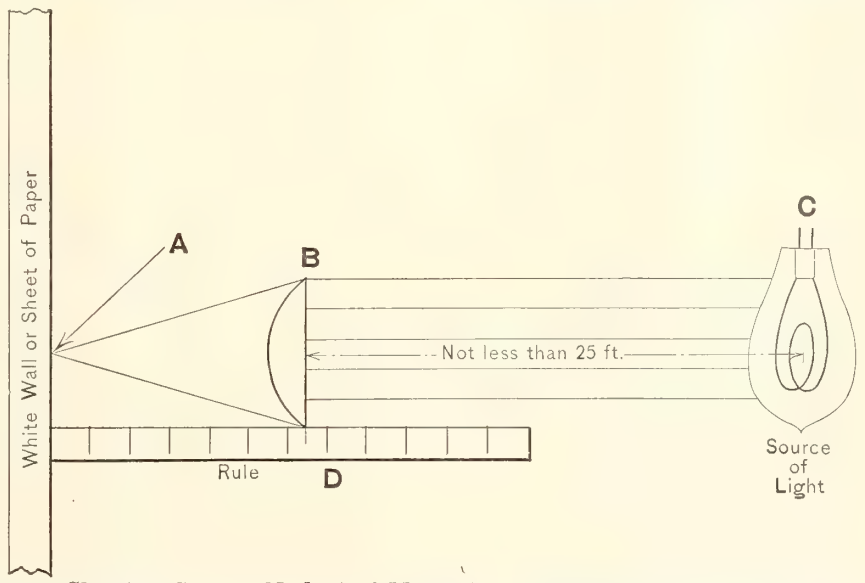

Diagram Showing Correct Method of Measuring Condensing Lens.

A—Focal point on sheet of white paper pinned on wall. B—Condensing lense with convex side toward wall. C—Source of light or object to be focused. D—Rule to measure focal length of lense.

Answer—The size condenser you would want for a picture 9 x 12 at 68 feet would be two 7½-inch focus condensers. To measure the focus of condensers you hold the condenser lens with the round or convex side up to a piece of white paper pinned to the wall (and move it in and out) being sure to hold it direct with the paper until the image is sharp and distinct on the paper; then measure from the paper on the wall to the flat side of the condenser and this will give you the focus of condenser.

We desire to call especial attention to this question of measuring the focal length of a condenser, and herewith give a diagram of the correct method. Our reason is that an incorrect method of measuring the focal length of condensers has been given publicity in a certain "hand book" recently published, which explains that the flat side of the condenser should be placed toward the wall. In a diagram of the correct method, herewith given, we show you exactly how it should be done. Set your condenser on edge, the round or convex side toward the wall, on which you have pinned a sheet of plain white paper. Lay a measuring rule running from the wall to the condenser. Use a light or window as the object to focus, placed at least 25 feet from the condenser. Move the condenser back and forth along the rule until the image on the white paper is sharp and distinct. Now note the number of inches on the rule from the wall to the flat side of the condenser: this will be the correct focal length of the condenser.

To prove to you that this is the correct method of measuring the focal length, reverse the condenser, placing the flat side to the wall. You will now discover that it is impossible to get a sharp and distinct image upon the paper.

ONLY PICTURES FOR SUNDAY THEATREGOERS.

"Nothing but motion pictures and illustrated songs hereafter, or nothing at all," will be the entertainment given in the Youngstown theatres on Sundays, are the latest orders of Mayor A. W. Craver, of Youngstown, O., and he intends to see that his orders are carried out to the letter.

According to Mayor Craver theatrical managers have been going the full limit in promoting Sunday performances, and now he intends to bring things to a sudden halt. As there is a city ordinance prohibiting managers to allow performers appearing in costume and makeup, his Honor now means to see that ordinance enforced and has served notice on all managers in Youngstown to that effect. While he does not state what the penalty will be should any manager attempt to break the law, it is said there will be something of interest going on if his orders are not complied with.

ELECTRICAL TALKS

On Electricity in Its Relation to the Motion Picture Theatre

By J. H. Hallberg

Written Expressly for The Film Index. Copyright by J. H. Hallberg. All Rights Reserved.

SUMMARY OF ELECTRICAL TALKS NO. 17.—The Watt Hour Meter registers only the "actual watts" consumed.

The "apparent watts" required by any load are determined by multiplying the amperes by the voltage.

The "actual watts" are determined by multiplying the "apparent watts" by the "power factor."

The "power factor" is obtained by dividing the "actual" watts by the "apparent" watts.

Direct current devices always operate at "unity power factor."

Alternating current devices, excepting incandescent lamps, certain forms of rheostats, and heaters always operate at less than "unity power factor."

"ELECTRICAL TALK" No. 18

How to Read Your Electric Meter.

In the preceding discussion you must have gathered a very fair knowledge of the electric meter including its construction, operation and general functions. The foregoing information was given to you in order to impress upon you the fact that Electric Watt Hour Meters are reliable and efficient devices. In order that you may have a still clearer understanding of this part of your electric equipment, it is necessary that you should know how to read your electric meter. By understanding how to do this you are not only enabled to check the meter readings at the end of each week, or month, against the readings made by the electric light company's meter reader, but you can also, at your own convenience, read a meter for any given period during the day, or at the beginning and the end of a day, thereby determining for yourself just what it costs you to operate your electric system.

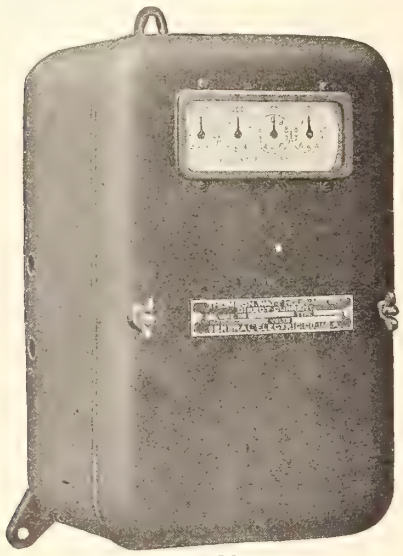

Fig. 36.

Suppose you want to find out how much it costs you to operate your M. P. lamp on a Rheostat. All you have to do, is to start the M. P. lamp at the given time, keep it operating for 10 minutes with no other lamps or loads on the meter, and, in the meantime, watch your electric meter record the current consumption. If your test is made for a period of 10 minutes, multiply the reading by 6, which will give you the current consumption for one hour; and then multiply the product thus obtained by the rate for current per kilowatt hour. This will give you the cost of operating your M. P. Lamp with rheostat for one hour.

If you wish to make a test of your M. P. lamp as controlled by an economizer, proceed in the same manner and by that method you can, within 10 minutes, determine the exact difference in current consumption with rheostat and economizer control. This test could be made in 10 or 15 minutes time, unless you wish to run a half hour or so in order to get the more correct average when no other lamps are burning. You can in that manner get an absolute record of the saving which otherwise could not be had unless you had a separate meter for that part of your installation which you want to test.

By the same method you can test any part of your installation as you can read the meter with only that portion of your installation connected to it, regarding which you want information.

Through the courtesy of the General Electric Company, I have obtained the latest instructions for reading the electric kilowatt hour or watt hour meter, which I am sure will prove interesting and instructive.

Before proceeding with the directions, I wish to call your attention to Figure 36 and Figure 37, illustrating the exterior and the interior of the Thomson Watt hour Meter.

Directions.

First—Note carefully the unit in which the dials read. On all meters made by the General Electric Company, the figures above or below the dials indicate the value of one complete revolution of the pointer, therefore one division indicates one-tenth of the amount marked above or below.

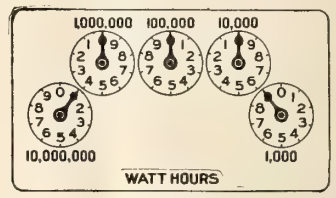

Fig. 39.

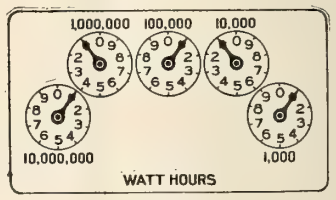

Fig. 40.

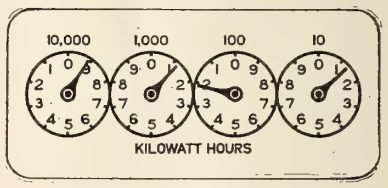

Fig. 41.

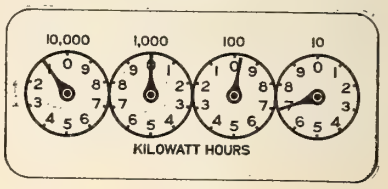

Fig. 42.

Second—Note direction of rotation of dial pointers. Counting from the right the pointers of the first, third and fifth dials of the General Electric Company's meters rotate in the direction of the hands of a watch, whereas the pointers of the second and fourth dials move in the opposite direction.

Third—Read dials from right to left, setting down figures as read.

Fourth—Always read the figure on each dial which has been last passed or is just covered by the pointer.

Note carefully that each dial reading depends on the reading of the one next to it on the right. Unless the one before it has completed a revolution or passed the 0, the pointer which is being read has not completed the division upon which it may appear to rest, and still indicates the figure last passed over.

Fifth—See if the register is direct reading, i. e., has no multiplying constant.

Some registers are not direct, but require that the dial reading be multiplied by a constant in order to obtain the true reading. If the register face bears the words, "multiply by ½" "multiply by 2," etc., the actual reading should be divided by two in the first case or doubled in the second, and similarly for other constants.

Sixth—Subtract from the present reading the reading of last month, multiply the difference in kilowatt hours by the rate per kilowatt hour you are paying and you have the amount of your bill in dollars and cents. The ruled page herewith illustrated in Fig. 38 will be found convenient for keeping a permanent record of each month's meter reading.

Earlier forms of General Electric Company's meters having five pointer dials reading in watt hours. Present types have four pointer dials reading in kilowatt hours.

Examples of Difficult Meter Readings.

On this page will be found examples of difficult meter readings, which may actually occur in practice. For instance in Fig. 39, the dial on the extreme right reads 900. The second apparently indicates 0; but since the first has not completed its revolution but indicates only 9 the second cannot have completed its division; hence the second dial indicates 9 also. The same is true of the hand of the third dial; the second, being 9, has not quite completed its revolution, so the third has not completed its division; therefore we again have 9. The same holds true of the hand of the fourth dial. The last hand (the extreme left) appears to rest on 1; but since the fourth is only 9, the last has not completed its division and therefore indicates 0. Putting the figures down from right to left, the total reading is 999,900, though one might erroneously read 1,999,900, making a mistake of 1,000,000 units.

By similar reasoning the value of other difficult indications may be obtained as illustrated in Figure 40, Figure 41 and Figure 42.

Summary.

It is of considerable value and of great satisfaction to any user of electricity to be able to read his own meter; to determine the current consumption for any part of his installation and to calculate the cost, which can be readily done by following the foregoing instructions for reading the electric meter and multiplying the reading in kilowatt hours by the rate per K. W. H.

In our next "Electrical Talk," we will discuss the arrangement of Electric Circuits for Motion Picture Theatres.

BANQUET FOR BALTIMORE PICTURE MEN

150 of Them Hold Big Feast and Have Good Time —First of Its Kind in Baltimore

About 150 picture men assembled at the Rennert Hotel, Baltimore, Md., Dec. 1, to attend the first annual banquet of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association of Baltimore. The banquet was a success in every way and brought together many of the owners and managers of the local motion picture theatres. Following the dinner, and after the cigars had been passed, Mr. William Fait, secretary and treasurer of the association, introduced Mr. J. Spencer Clark, collector of city water rent and taxes, who spoke on the subject, "The Taxes." Mr. Clark issued the first license to a motion picture theatre shortly after the big fire of 1904, and at the beginning of the present year he issued 106 licenses.

Mr. W. E. Sherwood, counsel for the association, in a brief and interesting address, pointed out the fact that the joint motion picture theatres in this city realized over $4,500,000 per year, and that it was one of the most promising and lucrative lines of business in existence at the present time and was growing rapidly. Several other members also made addresses. The officers of the association are as follows: President, J. C. Weidman; vice president, A. C. Steen; secretary and treasurer, William Fait, and counsel, Watson E. Sherwood.

"THE OLD WATER JAR"

A Vitagraph High Art Life Portrayal

INDIAN mythology, or theology, bears a deep significance upon the salvation of the red man; his future depends upon the disposition of the Great Spirit who ever watches his destinies.

"Pau Puk's" virtues are few and his sins are many, but his natural savagery to which he has given free rein has blunted the conscience which is inherent to every normal mind. He glories in his deeds of bloodshed and selfishness and records them on the old water jar, his most conspicuous acts, with an artistic skill that has won the admiration of his tribesmen. Altogether Pau Puk is an undesirable Indian; in his old age he is shunned by everyone of his fellows and appears a sort of bug-a-boo to squaws and children.

Sad and lonely he sits beside the rippling water of the gurgling rapids, lifts up the old water jar and as he reviews the pictures of his past misdeeds they are brought vividly before him as in a vision, but they are no longer the deeds of courage or the brave. He shrinks from them and shudders as he hears the voice of the great Spirit speaking to him in denunciation and reproach.

His conscience is awakened and he begins to understand why the children avoid him, why his people loathe him and why he is sad and lonely. His sins have found him out and he sees them painted in the lurid crimson on the water jar like blood red stains of the victims of his tomahawk, scalping knife and perfidy. He tries to hide them by covering the old water jar with his blanket, but they cannot be hid.

In remorse he falls upon his knees and prays to the Great Spirit for forgiveness. His prayers are heard and filled with the inspiration of the Great Father of his race, he paints in the one vacant panel of the old water jar a picture far different from all the others, a dedication of himself into the keeping of him whose memorial he inscribes upon the jar. His soul finds peace in the contemplation of the beauty, power and love of the soul's great chief.

SCENE FROM VITAGRAPH LIFE PORTRAYAL "THE OLD WATER JAR."

A great change has come over the old man and when at last his eyes grow dim and the hand of death is laid upon him he passes away surrounded and sustained by those who once despised him, as the Great Spirit welcomes him to the Happy Hunting Ground, and the waters of the sylvan stream are singing a sweet requiem.

This is a life portrayal that out-distances in psychological significance and soulful depth anything that has ever been produced in the history of drama. It proves that motion pictures have risen to the possibilities of the highest art.

MISSIONARY MOTION PICTURE SHOW.

Motion pictures were used at the First Baptist church, Brockton, Mass., on the night of Nov. 22, to illustrate the lecture given by Sumner R. Vinton, who was for many years a missionary in the Far East. It was the first time that motion pictures have been used in this city for missionary purposes, and also, the first time in the country.

His lecture was on "Western Women in Eastern Lands," and the pictures showed how the work done by the women in America has brought about great good in the eastern countries.

Playing the Pictures

By Clyde Martin

IT has only been in the last couple of years that any strides have been made towards playing the pictures and it has been just the last few months that musicians have awakened to the fact that they have a world of opportunities before them if they can master this new profession.

Last week, while we were running the Vitagraph picture "The Statue Dog," the release of November 25, it occurred to me that it was just such a picture that got me into the notion of making a study of playing the pictures. It was about four years ago, I was playing in one of the first picture houses in Denver, and if I remember correctly the name of the film was "Crayano." It showed a cartoonist drawing sketches, I think the first sketch was that of an Irishman, and I played "The Wearing of the Green." The second sketch was that of a dog and I played "Oh Where, Oh Where Is My Little Dog Gone," and there were several other sketches where such music filled in very well. Then at the close of the picture the cartoonist made a drawing of Col. Roosevelt, and of course I was there with "Yankee Doodle," or something of that nature, and naturally the house went into hysterics when the Roosevelt picture was completed, and I took credit for half of the applause (this was four years ago), at any rate I was "mut" enough to believe that the audience was showing their appreciation of my work. Although I have learned better since, I was innocent of the fact at that time, that half of the rotten vaudeville acts and some of the manufacturers of motion pictures would unfurl the American flag at the end or climax in order to get a hand. At that, I am glad that my conscience did not hurt me at that time, for, it put me in the notion of watching for points in the pictures where I could use appropriate music, and I trust that the Vitagraph picture of "The Statue Dog" will have a tendency to start more beginners into playing the pictures.

In "The Statue Dog" several opportunities present themselves where short strains of popular tunes can be used to good advantage. When the title "A Rah Rah Boy" comes on, you can play "He's a College Boy" or "College Boys," then comes a title "2 A. M.," you can play "We Wont Go Home Until Morning," and when the title "Kelly" comes on you can play "Has Anybody Here Seen Kelly." But when the dog is shown holding the American flag, we have a subject that must be considered.

When the American flag is used in a picture, the average piano player falls into the first national air that comes into his mind, this is very well as far as your own patriotism is concerned, but if you will play something else in such a scene, and let the flag take due credit for the applause I believe you will be handling the situation in the proper way.

Of course, there are certain pictures like the Pathe picture the "Clemency of Abraham Lincoln" where national airs have been used throughout the picture that it is very appropriate to use them when the flag is shown as well. But the pictures I have reference to are such pictures as "The Statue Dog," where the producer has resorted to such unprofessional means to "pull a picture through."

I once knew of a fly-by-night vaudeville act that was so rotten it would have been hissed off the stage had it not been that they closed their act by letting down a big drop, on which was painted the American flag. When the audience saw the drop they gave it (the drop) a big hand and the vaudevillians took several bows. At the end of the week the manager, on the Saturday night show, had his carpenter put a sign on the drop reading "Three cheers for the Red, White and Blue, not the act," and I believe the performers took eighteen or twenty bows that night before they discovered the sign on their drop.

This week I received a letter from a piano player, asking foolish question No. 999 "What can you play for dramatic pictures, can you give me a list of selections that won't make the work so tiresome?" Here is my answer: "If you find the art of playing the pictures becoming tiresome to you, don't undertake a profession that means work afternoon and night. If you would really make a success at playing the pictures, your work would be a pleasure and not a burden to you. If you have some relative in politics that can get you a job in the city hall, there's where you will be a shining light, or if you have money, go to Florida for the winter and take a rest, anyone that would write such a foolish letter either needs a rest or an examination."

I have received a large number of such foolish letters, and then I have received many letters giving practical tips and asking reasonable questions, and I am glad to hear from musicians at any time and be of any service possible.

A piano player that plays the pictures knows that it means hours of hard work, but if they are heart and soul in their work and are looking forward to a future, they will find their work to be a pleasure and not a drudge. If the work is a drudge to you, you had better get off of the job and find something "easy."

I cannot see why playing the pictures would be a burden to any musician. If you are playing for vaudeville, you are obliged to play as the act wants you to, if you are doing concert work you are in a rut, the same thing week in and week out. But picture playing offers something better. You have a large field, you have quite an assortment of subjects, you have no one but yourself to fight it out with. What more can you ask I was really glad to get such a foolish letter, for I never believed there was anyone with musical ability that found their work to be a burden.

Did you ever notice that the stars on the legitimate stage usually "get a hand" at their first appearance of the evening? This is just as true with the ten, twenty and thirty-cent attractions as it is with those higher up. Each have their own class of admirers. It is just the same with the motion picture star, yet, have you ever tried to "work up" the entrance of Florence Turner, Alice Joyce, or any of the stars of the picture world? I have, and have met with success. I make it a point to "work up" the entrance of the popular stars and it never fails that the audience gives them a round of applause. It is true this is a small point, but, I believe, it makes the audience more enthusiastic in the pictures and has a tendency to make more admirers of the silent drama.

If you have any suggestions in this line, if you have discovered any new way of "working up" scenes, just drop me a line and I assure you any pointers will be appreciated by readers of The Index, as well as myself.

MANAGER GIVES BENEFIT PERFORMANCE

Vaudeville Performers Whose Clothing Was Destroyed by Fire Given Benefit at Iris Theatre

In order to help two little vaudeville performers, Misses Rogers and Dolliver, who had the misfortune to lose their wearing apparel and other belongings in a fire which occurred in their dressing rooms at the Broadway theatre, Chico, Cal., on the night of November 26, Manager Worrall of the Iris photoplay theatre, gave the proceeds of two evening performances to the unfortunate little dancers, in order to help them until they secured another engagement.

The fire in the Broadway theatre was started in the young women's dressing room by the overturning of an oil heater. It happened about 9 o'clock when the house was crowded, and just at the time the dancers were to make their appearance. When they saw what had happened Miss Dolliver very coolly went on the stage and began dancing while stage hands got busy trying to put out the blaze, which was eating its way from the dressing room to the scenery.

Miss Dolliver kept her wooden shoes busy dancing until someone on the stage announced to the audience that the stage was on fire, but there was no danger providing those in the house would walk out quietly; this put a stop to any stampede that might have been caused otherwise. When the fire was extinguished it was found that it had done about $500 damage, and, besides, had burned all the clothes the young actresses had in their dressing room.

When it became known that Miss Dolliver and her partner had lost all their clothing and were forced to go out in the street in their stage costumes, immediately the crowd began to contribute towards helping them. Manager Worrall in giving two performances for their benefit had crowded houses and was most heartily thanked by the actresses and also by the manager of the Broadway theatre for his generosity.

NEW HOUSE FOR RICHMOND.

In spite of the strict closing law in Richmond, Va., the old Southern capital seems to call for more photoplay theatres to meet the demands of the pleasure going public. The latest theatre, which will be on Broad street, between Jefferson and Adams, is to be built by M. L. Hofheimer, a well known theatrical man. The new house, will be called "The Star," and will seat over 900 persons; it will cost about $30,000. The price of admission will be ten cents, and only pictures will be used.

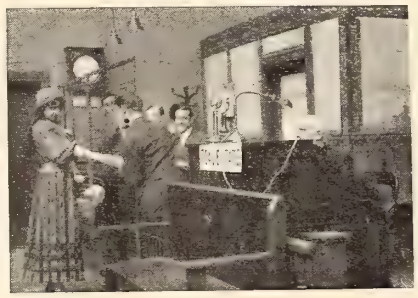
"ELDORA, THE FRUIT GIRL."—This picture deals with the East Side element of New York City, and depicts a charming love story around the tenement quarters of Mulberry Bend.

John Norwood's real estate office is the opening scene in the picture, and in it we are shown little Eldora, the fruit girl, making her usual call to pay the rent. Robert, Mr. Norwood's son, a boy of about twenty years of age, has become accustomed to see little Eldora on her visits. At first it was merely a passing glance that they bestowed upon one another, but as time wore on they began to look for each other, until at last a friendship sprang up between them which soon ripened into deep love.

All this is unknown to the father, who has made other plans for his boy's future; and so deep are they that he even arranges the evening on which his son Robert is to propose to the girl of his choice. This is carried out so completely by the old folks that the young couple are left together conveniently for this very purpose, and Robert is so completely under his father's rule that he is almost on the very point of asking the momentous question of the waiting maiden, from whose lips one can easily see that the word



"yes" is but waiting for the proper moment to be uttered, but the figure of little Eldora stands between them—her great brown eyes are looking into his—he can see her in his mind—and he knows that he is doing wrong.

Ashamed of his weakness Robert leaves the house hurriedly and seeking his father confides to him the truth of his affection for Eldora. That his father becomes greatly wroth over the new turn of affairs is putting is mildly. The next day he sends for Eldora and in a strong dramatic scene shows her how little she is fit to become the wife of his son, pours into her ears all the old arguments of station, race and money until he convinces her that marriage with his son will drag the boy she loves down, that her love for him will prove a curse instead of a blessing; and so she, poor girl, proves her great love by sending for her lover, and in one of those wonderfully enacted scenes which reach the height of dramatic climax she laughs at him, makes light of his devotion to her and finally proclaims her love for another. This has the desired effect upon the boy. She has done her duty, she has kept her promise; but her little heart is broken, and Mr. Norwood never realizes how true, how noble her love is until the next day when he reads in the paper of her attempt to end her life by throwing herself in front of an automobile.

Then he realizes what he has done—that he is the guilty party and that, if she dies, he will have committed a great crime. But she shall live if money, power and the best physicians in the land can save her. Together father and son hurry to the hospital, and here the father sees two young hearts united and realizes that love is stronger than death, that position, money and power are not all that life holds after all and that love such as this is life's priceless jewel.

"A FAMILY OF VEGETARIANS."—This is the story of Mr. Brown, a vegetarian, and Mr. Jenkins, a meat eater. Mr. Brown has a marriageable daughter who rather likes meat but does not dare to express her desire. Mr. Jenkins pretends to be a vegetarian in order to win the heart and hand of the daughter. The young people marry. Returning to their homes after a brief honeymoon they are almost famished for the want of meat, each planning and scheming as to the best course to pursue in order to satisfy the craving. In trying to deceive each other regarding their true appetites comical situations arise, and a laughable climax is reached when they accidentally find themselves face to face in a restaurant, both eating meat like two hungry hunters. An understanding between them is brought about and they resume eating meat, evidently enjoying it.

The following day Mr. Brown, the staunch vegetarian, pays a visit to his newly married daughter and son-in-law. It so happens that he finds himself alone in the dining room. The odor of roast beef on the table tempts him to try just a little. He finds it so palatable that he helps himself to a goodly portion, which he devours with a ravenous appetite. The family catching him in the act makes his position rather embarrasing as well as most laughable, his lame excuses being of no avail; and now that they seem to understand each other they all agree to sit down to their first square meal.

The fun in this picture waxes fast and furious at times, making it a most enjoyable as well as a very laughable film.

"THE ROMANCE OF HEFTY BURKE."—Hefty Burke is a big-hearted, sturdy boatman of the East Side of New York City. He falls in love with Mamie Casey, and proposes to and is accepted by her at a ball given by the Sailors' Union. One "Big" Marks, a rough sort of a character who is a sailor boarding house runner, has aspirations for Mamie's hand and is extremely jealous of Hefty. He shows this when he discovers the reciprocation of Hefty's affection by Mamie at the ball.

All goes well with Hefty's love affair until one day, as he is rowing in his boat, he chances to see a girl fall from the rail of a freight steamer in the harbor and quickly dives to her rescue. This brings about an acquaintance which almost disrupts the engagement between Hefty and Mamie Casey. The day after the rescue Hefty sees fit to call at the freight boat and inquire for the health of the Senorita, who it turns out is the daughter of an Equadorian Revolutionist who is taking a cargo of ammunition to South America to help the rebels against the government of Equador. This fact becomes known when a case which the sailors are lowering into the hatchway falls to the deck, bursts open and discloses the fact that its contents are rifles.

Hefty and the others at the boarding house, including "Big" Marks, have seen a newspaper item to the effect that a vessel then loading for South American ports is suspected of carrying contraband of war. He immediately realizes that this is the vessel in question but is too big-hearted and honest to take the five thousand dollars reward offered for giving information obtained in such a way, and pledges secrecy. The Senor, attracted by the young man, urges him to join the party in the fight for freedom, promising him high rank as an officer and perhaps the hand of his own fair daughter.

The meeting between the Senor, his daughter and Hefty is seen by "Big" Marks, and he overhears an appointment made for the next evening. This news he immediately imparts to Mamie Casey who, when her own eyes confirm the fact that Hefty and the Senorita are together, writes Marks in a fit of jealous rage how he can get the five thousand dollars reward. Hefty, however, though tempted is loyal to Mamie, and if he has allowed himself to be attracted by the dreamy eyes of the Spanish girl, he quickly pulls himself together and refuses the offer.

Mamie the next day, just before the time for the ship's sailing, receives a characteristically frank letter from him telling her just what has happened. Overcome by remorse she rushes to his boarding-house and tells him of the disclosure she made to Marks. There is not a moment to lose. He intercepts Marks just as he is about to inform the harbor police and forces him to accompany him to a bar room, where he "entertains" him in such a way that Marks is unable to give the information. This hospitality is somewhat forced upon Marks—in fact it becomes necessary for Hefty to administer a knock-out blow during the entertainment; but four o'clock passes and we see the ship safely sailing. Hefty forgives Mamie and we see them good friends at the finish much to Marks discomforture.

The story is an unusual and interesting one, and the various types of characters typical of water front life are cleverly brought out.

G. MELIES.

"IN THE TALL GRASS COUNTRY."—Look before you leap—at hasty conclusions. Nell is a sweet girl and Bob is a good fellow, Nell is a typical Texas girl and Bob is a comparatively new comer from the East. Well, anyway Bob falls in love with Nell and they are engaged.

Bob's sister Helen writes Bob that she is coming to the Tall Grass Country to see him. He gets the letter at the Post-office, reads it and starts for home. At a corner of the road a woman appears, frightens Bob's horse and, in controlling it, his sister's letter signed "Yours with love, Helen" drops to the ground. The woman who so suddenly made her appearance in the road is an old fried-egged-faced gossip. She picks up the letter and hustles back to town to put Nell wise to Bob's perfidy. Nell takes the bait and Bob is "in bad." To still add to his troubles the old mischief-maker tells Nell that Bob is bringing the Eastern girl to his shack and she saw them coming down. Sure enough Nell sees Bob caressing the girl as they are driving along together.

Helen is delighted with Texas and likes to rove about its fields and prairies. One day she goes out in the tall grass and wanders a long distance away—a careless hunter shooting game sets fire to the grass and Helen is surrounded by a prairie fire. Nell sees the fire, gets her spy-glasses to bring the scene closer and recognizes Helen in the midst of the flames. Revenge is now struggling with the more noble inclination to rescue the girl who has stepped between her and Bob.

She rushes from the house and across the country until she come to Helen, half carries and half leads her to safety while she herself falls fainting at the edge of a stream. Bob gets anxious about Helen's absence, sees the smoke and flames of the burning grass, fears the worst and arouses the cowboys who all start to find the missing girl.

They find Helen, take her to her brother's cabin where they revive her. She tells about Nell and again they go back over the trail to rescue Nell. Bob discovers her unconscious at the river's edge, carries her to his home where she recovers. She shrinks from Bob and tells him to declare his love for the girl from the East.

Bob begins to see the lay of things and tells Nell that she is slightly mixed in her conclusions; taking Helen by the hand, he relieves Nell's mind by introducing his sister to her. Nell is dazed, then looks foolish and saves herself from further embarrassment by throwing her arms about Bob's neck and receiving the comfort of his loving embrace.

"WINNING BACK HIS LOVE."—Heroic treatment is sometimes necessary to correct an ill, and many are the occasions that things go from bad to worse for want of courage, for it does take courage to resort to heroic treatment. Then again, none are so morally blind that they cannot be made to see in reproaching reflexibility the error of their way. Mrs. Wallace is possessed of a disturbing premonition that her husband's love is waning, and truth to say her fears are well grounded, for, although she doesn't know of anything conclusively, still there is a reason, and that reason is Vera Blair, a show girl, who, believing Frederick Wallace to be a single man, is attracted by him and successfully fascinates him. He has spent several evenings in her company and now finds her irrestible. Hence, when he receives a note asking him to accompany her to a little after-the-show supper, he hastens to comply. This note falls into the hands of the wife, who is beside herself with grief, when Bob Martin, a friend of the family, appears. Upon learning the cause of her woe, he suggests a plan to cure Fred of his folly. This remedy is to pay him back in his own coin, to-wit: visit the cafe in his company and pretend a reckless abandon, thereby putting the "shoe on the other foot." Repugnant as this procedure is to her, she is induced to consent as it will mean one thing or the other decisively. Fred has arrived at the stage door and meeting the girl he is just leaving for the cafe when the wife and the friend appear in the distance. They follow and secure the adjoining private booth to that occupied by Fred and the girl. It isn't long before Fred hears the clink of glasses and a hilarious laugh that is unmistakably his wife's. Stealthily, drawing the curtain dividing the booths aside, the sight that greets him freezes his blood, for there is his wife, with an empty wine glass in her hand, apparently in a state of mild intoxication, accompanied by their dearest friend. In an instant he is towering with rage. His wife in such a place drinking with his friend outrageous! Ah! but he doesn't yet appreciate the enormity of his own fault. Getting the girl into another room by subterfuge, he bursts in upon what he deems the guilty pair. Urged by the friend, the wife continues to play her part, though her heart is well near breaking, and almost rebels. At this point the girl returns for her gloves which she dropped and learns now that he is a married man. She scorns him with even more vehemence than his wife appears to do, and departs, the wife leaving at the same time. Left alone, he now realizes his profligacy and the value of his wife's love, which he imagines he has lost. As he sits there alone, he is in the depths of desperation when he espies on the table a water glass filled with wine—it is now clear to him. His wife did not drink, but poured the wine into this glass and pretended intoxication to show him the error of his way, which he now sees only too clearly. What a wretch he has been. What a jewel she is to suffer indignity for his sake. Jumping up from the table, he rushes home with a firm purpose of amendment bestowing upon her love and attention she hungered for.

"HIS WIFE'S SWEETHEARTS."—Little did Jenkins dream of the trouble he was cooking up for himself when he, in a spasm of generosity, bought his wife a beautiful fur-lined coat and picture hat. But such is fate. Entering with these above mentioned articles of feminine apparel, they excite the covetousness of the servants. We all know that the most serious servants question is "How do I look in Madam's clothes." Mr. Jenkins starts off on a business trip and Mrs. J. sits and dozes in a Morris chair. Fine for the housemaid, who has a date with her sweetheart. She wears the coat and hat, intending to show her beau how she looks in fine feathers. Jenkins, meanwhile, has arrived at the railroad station and finds his train an hour late. He will go back home for the time, and on the way sees what he imagines his wife in the arms of a strange man. Rushing up, he proceeds to annihilate the supposed wrecker of his home, while the coat and hat with its wearer disappear. When Jenkins enters and finds his wife asleep and the articles in place, he is mystified, satisfied in a measure, that he was mistaken. Sheepishly he exits and starts back to the railroad station, where he is this time just one second too late. Nothing to do now but go home and wait for the train. On the way back, he espies the coat and hat, the wearer in the arms of a sailor. This time it is the kitchen-maid. With a cry, "What, another " he springs at the sailor, and is effectively done up by the burly tar, the kitchen girl having "beat it." putting the coat back where it is later appropriated by the colored maid. Mrs. J. awakes and discovering the loss, gives alarm and a policeman is put on the trail. This policeman finds the missing duds in Jenkins' possession for he has caught the maid and taken them from her. Things look conclusive as to Jenkins being the thief and he is arrested, his wife notified, and through her identification is released. Jenkins' little act of generosity cost him several cases of heart failure, an arrest, a bedraggled suit of clothes and two black eyes.

"AFTER THE BALL."—Brown might have known that he took his life in his own hands when he accompanied Smith and Jones to the Masque Ball, being fully aware of the violence of his wife's temper. Having braved the situation thus far, he might have returned to his home early. But no, the fun was too fast and furious and there is something coming to him on his return, for Mrs. Brown sits waiting for him with a rolling-pin which she intends to bounce off his head. It is the wee hours of the morning and yet Brown cometh not. Mrs. Brown at length gets tired and retires. She has hardly done so when Brown and his friends enter still wearing their masquerade costumes, Smith as a burglar, and Jones as a copper. The sight of the rolling-pin lying on the table arouses Brown's realization of what he may expect. In the throes of his terror a scheme which seems good if it works, occurs to him. Jones as the copper must hide, Smith as the burglar is to overpower Brown, the skirmish to awaken Mrs. B. Well did the scheme work. It did in the start out, but a false move on the part of the trio discovered them and then well we drew the curtain.

"THE RUSTLERS."—On a big ranch in the West, where great bands of horses roam the foothills, where men are wont to regard life from a far different viewpoint than their cousins of the East, Old Jim Canby had brought up his family. The eldest sister and brother were sent away to a city school and given an education. In the girl the experience was for good, but not so the boy. He has contracted expensive habits and his demand for money was insatiable.

The opening of the story shows the boy on his yearly visit to the ranch. Falling in with a rough crowd of punchers he is soon started on a career of reckless gambling and brawling. Operating in the vicinity is a band of horse rustlers, who the ranch owners are trying to run down and exterminate.

Bob is not bad at heart, but finding himself deprived of money with which to gamble, he is easily persuaded to join forces with this desperate gang. Hardly realizing the enormity of his crime, after a particularly successful raid, he is engaged with his companions in his usual pastime of gambling, when the gang is suddenly surrounded by a posse and quickly captured.

Realizing for the first time his awful position, he makes a dash for liberty, in which he is desperately wounded. The final scene at home, and the grief of his stricken parents, ends a story of intense interest, pointing a moral for good that is much stronger than any sermon.

"JUSTINIAN AND THEODORA."—Justinian's life is saved and his heart is lost to Theodora. Ursus, the gladiator, vows to devote his life to Theodora's service. The reign of Emperor Justin is a tumultuous one, as he proclaims his nephew, Justinian, heir to the throne. Prince Rechizad, who had lived and hoped in vain for both the throne and the hand of the fair Theodora, is taunted by the court fool and the Emperor's guards. He vows vengeance upon Justin and the admired Theodora. Justinian, being ordered to Rome, secretly weds; is in a short time taken prisoner by Theodoric, King of the Goths, where he is held a captive in the Gothic court. A year later he received a scroll from Theodora, saying "he must return and claim the throne, as Prince Rechizad is in open rebellion and Emperor Justin dying;" his sensational escape from the Gothic prison and request to her to "hold the throne," that Ursis will arm the gladiators and proclaim her Queen. He arrives before the emperor dies, defeats the Goths and is crowned King by his uncle Justin.

"IN NEIGHBORING KINGDOMS."—Two kings of neighboring kingdoms, one has a son, the other a daughter. They want the Prince and Princess to marry each other. The Prince has never seen the Princess and she has never seen him. King Priam decides to have a miniature painted of his daughter and have her send it to Prince Philamon. King Kenwill hits upon the same idea; both hope that in this way they may bring the young people together and thus the two kingdoms will be united. The Prince doesn't like the idea; neither does the Princess, and they both try to make themselves look as homely as possible, twisting and distorting their faces while the artists are painting their portraits.

The pictures are exchanged, and both royal offspring refuses to marry when they see what each other looks like. The fathers insist upon it, and the Prince and Princess run away from home to escape the alliance.

The Princess meets a goose girl tending her geese, exchanges clothes with her and takes her place as a peasant. The Prince exchanges places with a miller, and, thus disguised, they meet and fall in love. He says that he would like to marry her, but he is of royal blood, and she says the same thing. Disgusted with their experiences, they go back to their palaces and resume their places in the royal households.

King Priam still insists that his daughter shall marry the Prince, and King Kenwill is just as determined the Prince shall marry the Princess Norma, until, seeing no way to escape it, they consent to wed.

The day for the nuptials has arrived. Priam's court is in readiness and the Prince and Princess reluctantly make each other's acquaintance, to learn that they are the same persons who met in disguise as a goose girl and miller, and they both love each other dearly, much to the joy and delight of the two kings, who give way to their happiness in unreserved and uncontrollable ecstasy.

The ceremony is performed and the wedding march is joined by all the guests, followed by the court buffoon, driving a pair of white geese, symbolic of the folly of the two young people in objecting to each other in the beginning.

"CRAZY APPLES."—Mandy makes a sneak from home and meets "Si" Hopper down by the orchard fence. The sublime moment as they stand gazing into each other's eyes is interrupted by the approach of Mandy's pa, who is slightly "spicious" of Si's attentions to his daughter. Si doesn't wait for an interview with old man Tompkins, but jumps "kaplunk" into the pig pen swill trough. Pa asks Mandy what she is doing down in the orchard, and she readily replies, "nothing." He tells her she can find something better to do at home. Can't fool the old man, although he does not see Si.

"Here's a pretty mess," says Si, as he picks himself from the trough and goes into the barn, where he changes his trousers and then tries to steal unseen back home. Fate has placed Mrs. Dubbs in his way. Just as he is passing through the orchard, he on one side of the fence and she on the other, she asks Si for an apple. He tells her they are no good, and tries to dodge behind the tree, doubling himself up and performing other strange stunts as he jumps around like a frog to hide the absence of his trousers.

These surprising antics lead Mrs. Dubbs to decide that Si has suddenly gone insane. She hurries away to spread the news, and before long there is no question as to who's looney now. Si is looked upon as a pronounced "dip," and his sympathetic friends are not satisfied until he is carted away to an asylum for the mentally disordered.

During all this confusion Mandy cannot understand it, and nobly stands up for Si. Her mind is relieved and matters cleared up when she discovers Si's trousers hanging in the pig pen. Here is the solution to all Si's queer actions before Mrs. Dubbs in the orchard. To the rescue! She tries to reach Si, without avail, and is at last drawn to the extreme of feigning insanity herself and taking a carriage ride to the insane institution, where they meet and arrange to escape. She accomplishes this by going to the orchard, sitting on the fence where Mrs. Dubbs first noticed Si's "carryings-on," and, as luck would have it, Mrs. Dubbs sees Mandy bereft, as she thinks, of her reason, and at once attributes it to the apples.

Well, as we were saying, Mandy and Si manage to escape from the funny place, and are soon home again, where they tell Mandy's pa all about things. He has been testing the "crazy apples" himself and feels greatly relieved when he learns that they are only ordinary apples. The asylum guards come after Mandy and Si, but Mr. Tompkins assures them that

"WHERE THE WIND BLOWS."—"Now that you have consented to marry me, I'm going to give you a betrothal present," saying this Hugh gives a whistle and Jean comes bouncing to him and he gives the dog to Nancy. She is delighted and Hugh goes down the bluff, leaving his sweetheart and Jean watching him.

Happily and joyously Nancy returns to her home, only to be saddened by the news that the bank in which her father had his savings has failed, and he must go back to the sea for a livelihood.

Nancy sends the news by Jean to Hugh, and Hugh loses no time in coming to the rescue by securing the father a berth on the same vessel with him. Hugh and Nancy's father sail away; the mother and daughter wave them a fond, long good-bye, while Jean tries to comfort them.

They have been gone these two months when the vessel is foundered, and the last boat is leaving the distressed vessel, with Hugh and Nancy's father still on the ship; there is room for only one more. Hugh persuades the father to save himself, while he stays behind. Hugh clings to the wreck as long as it holds, then he takes to a raft and is rescued.

Nancy and her mother leave the old home and are obliged to work for their living by digging clams, at which Jean makes herself useful and helpful. The father returns very much enfeebled, and he, too, must help to keep the household going.

Jean is a faithful and loving companion to Nancy, but poverty forces her to sell the dog to a captain whose vessel is anchored in port. Hugh gets work on the vessel, by which he was rescued, receives his pay and takes his leave, returning to Nancy's old home, to find it deserted. He wanders down to the wharves and thinks about shipping with the captain who has bought Jean. As he is talking to the captain he sees Jean, learns where the captain got the dog, and, with the captain's consent, the dog soon leads Hugh to Nancy's cabin on the seashore. The captain follows and observes them at a distance.

Soon the two lovers are brought together. Jean is jumping and barking in great delight. The captain takes in the situation; his heart goes out to the young people and he returns Jean to Nancy with his best wishes. By hard work and the combined interests of Hugh, Nancy, her mother and father, they are soon back in their old home, comfortable and happy.

"MAKING A MAN OF HIM."—Archie Garrison's father is David Garrison, financier and multimillionaire. Archie is a butterfly young man who spends his time—and his father's money—on automobiles, yachts and the like. David Garrison having fought his way up from poverty, is grieved to see the path his son is traveling, and conceives a plan whereby he hopes to reclaim him. Archie is at a gay house-party when he receives a telegram announcing that his father's entire fortune has been swept away. He says goodbye to his friends—including a sweet girl—and takes a train for home. Arriving there, he finds the family living in a cheap flat. His mother and sister are doing the housework. His father appears to be worn and broken down. Archie shows them that there is in him the stuff of which men are made. He tries to comfort his parents and sister. Within a few days he dons overalls and goes to work in a machine shop in a neighboring city. He works hard, lives frugally and saves his money. A short vacation gives him opportunity to go home on a visit. He arrives at the flat where he had left the family in seeming poverty. They are not there and no one can tell him what has become of them. On the street Archie meets an old friend who laughs heartily when he tells his story and advises him to call at the family mansion. Archie is puzzled, but he goes to the old home where he is amazed to find his mother and sister in the midst of a grand social function. They send him to his father for an explanation of the mystery. The outer guardian of his father's office door hardly recognizes this husky, strapping, determined young man, but he gains admittance finally. David greets his son with pride and then explains the whole scheme. Archie is angry at first, but he soon sees the wisdom of his father's action and they are reconciled. Archie has become a real man for real responsibilities.

"BLUE HORSE MINE."—Frank Woods, a young easterner, was out west with Dick Saunders, his friend and partner in the mining business. They had never struck "pay dirt" but they had plenty of hope. Frank supplied the "grub stake" and Dick did the active work. One day, while riding through the desert, Frank found an Indian dying from exhaustion. He revived him and took him to the mining camp. Shortly thereafter Frank returned east and changed his activities temporarily from gold-mining to girl-winning. The object of his affections was pretty Dorothy Daly, whose father was a wealthy banker. Frank finally won Dorothy's consent, but wasn't so fortunate with her father. He didn't object to Frank as a man, but he advised him kindly to make his fortunate first. Deeply disappointed, Frank returned to his rooms. There he found a letter from Dick containing the great news that he had struck rich ore and would need $10,000 to develop. Frank hurried to Dorothy's father, but there was "nothing doing" in the money line. He went to Dorothy for comfort and that bright girl solved the problem. She showed him a newspaper article about the international Marathon race which would be worth $20,000 to the winner. Here was a great prize and Frank was a runner with a great record. Frank determined to enter and wired Dick that he would win the money to develop the mine. Then a man named Carr began annoying Dorothy with his attentions. On one occasion it became necessary for Frank to eject him from the house. In so doing he fell and broke him arm and it seemed to be all up with the Blue Horse mine. When the news came to Dick Saunders out west, the Indian, Blue Horse, was there and heard it. "Ugh, me run race," was all he said. And so, in due time he arrived in the east with a letter of introduction to Frank which simply said, "Keep Blue Horse away from the whiskey." Blue Horse went into training. Carr knew that if the Indian won the race, the mine would be developed and Frank would marry Dorothy. He tried in every way to get the "fire water" into the hands of Blue Horse, but the cunning of the Red Man was equal to that of Carr. He pretended to be badly intoxicated just before the race and Carr thinking his scheme had been successful, bet large sums against the Indian representative of America. Then Blue Horse went in and won easily. He turned the prize money over to Dick and Frank and they made him full partner and named the mine for him. Of course, Dorothy became Mrs. Frank and so, was a sort of partner-in-law.

"GIRLS WILL BE BOYS."—Mrs. Brandon, a wealthy society woman, noted for her eccentric ways, particularly in relation to her methods of bringing up her daughters, has dressed them each since they were able to toddle in masculine attire, encouraged them in the pursuit of manly sports, and even allowed them to smoke if they chose.

At their country home, surrounded by beautiful grounds, carefully fenced in from the prying eyes of any curious man, the girls are wont to disport themselves with rod and gun, rowing, etc.

On the day our story opens Mrs. Brandon has planned a little picnic for her three daughters. It is a fine autumn day and armed with shotguns and dressed in their masculine shooting togs they find a secluded spot in the woods, frequented only by the Brandon gamekeeper.

Now it happens that three students from a university in a neighboring town blunder into the forbidden grounds, obtain a glimpse of the girls, or young men, as they suppose them to be at first, but are chased away by the gamekeeper before they learn the true identity of the young ladies. Francois, the French student, flees with the other two boys at his heels and turns up at another part of the woods, where the girls have left their luncheon. A moment later they see them returning and all hide in the brambles on the other side of the fence to await the coming of the huntresses.

Wilma, Shirley and Alberta soon appear when the boys, to their great surprise, find that instead of young men hunters, they are remarkably stunning young ladies. Young Rollins, the most courageous of the three, steps out from ambush, soon followed by the other two. There is almost a stampede at first when the girls find the men on the grounds, Alberta particularly annoyed as she recognizes in Rollins the young man who protected her in a street fight in the city a few days previou, when a ruffian, unaware of her sex, had picked a quarrel with her. In the scuffle which had followed Alberta had lost her ring, which was picked up by Rollins. Rollins soon recognizes her and there is an embarrassing moment until the young man bravely returns the ring, thus making it apparent that he knows her.

Luncheon for six soon follows, much to the discomfort of the man servant, who serves, during which Wilma slips Malcom a note asking him and Francois to meet the girls on the Brandon porch that evening. Malcolm promises to do so, but loses the note, which is later picked up by young Rollins, who sees that he had not been included in the invitation.

That night Malcolm and Francois are on the job, but get into the gymnasium instead of the conservatory. Shortly after, Mrs. Barndon, who has fallen defeated in the girls' revolt against further continuing their mannish ways, and who brings in her three handsome daughters all decked out in ribbons and lace. Mrs. Brandon sees that the boys have completely won the hearts of her daughters and pairs off two of them, selecting poor Malcolm for herself, however.

"A GAMBLER OF THE WEST."—The feature of this film is the perfect reproduction to a minute detail of the typical Western cattle town gambling dive. The story, also, is one of exceptional strength and points a moral lesson against the gambling evil which cannot fail to impress both young and old.

Albert Thomas, an old cattle man, and his daughter are in comfortable circumstances, but owing to Thomas's passion for gambling their funds have run low.

The story opens showing Frank Halsted, proprietor of the "Three-Star Gambling Palace,' opening up his place for business. Halsted is a fine type of the young Westerner, care-free, conscience-clear. In the West, overflowing with the riff-raff of restless humanity, Halsted fits his role that of the philosophy of live while life's worth living.

The gambling tables are arranged for the night, the old wheel of fortune oiled at its axis, the faro dealer takes his place at the table and business begins.

The scene changes to Thomas's home. He and his daughter Alice are together when the old man, meditating over what may be doing at the Three-Star, covertly reaches into his pocket, finds that he has a little change and rising, turns to leave, promising Alice faithfully not to go to the Three-Star.

However, the temptation is too great and despite the entreaties of conscience he is unable to resist. Shortly after he has entered the gambling house, taken his seat at the faro table and lost all his money. His gun and watch follow, and stripped of all valuables, he sighs and turns to leave. Bitterly cursing his luck he finally resolves to stake all in an effort to make a winning and soon turns back to present the faro dealer with a note for $500 with his ranch properties as security.

This is also lost and Stewart staggers to his feet when Alice enters. There is a short altercation between father and daughter, then Alice turns to the faro-dealer enraged. Halsted steps over to quiet the row and is so impressed by the girl's good looks that he makes the faro-dealer return the old man's money and valuables, and also destroying the note, under the pretense that the faro-dealer cheated.

Some time later the Thomas's, who have disposed of a herd of cattle, are on their feet again. However, when the old man sees the gold the gambling fever returns, and when Alice is out, slips out of the house and to the "Three-Star." Here Halsted refuses to allow him to play and sends him away.

Alice has missed her father and suspecting his whereabouts saddles a horse and rides to the "Three Star" only to be informed that her father has left with the intention of visiting another house where he can play.

The girl begs Halsted to do something to save her father and he, after faithfully promising to do his best, mounts a horse and rides away.

He follows Thomas's trail and finally quietly passes him; then dismounts, puts on a mask and waits for Thomas. The old man is held up, his gold taken away from him by the supposed highwayman and told to "beat it."

Later Halsted rides up to the Thomas ranch house, enters, and presents the money to Alice. As he turns to leave Alice calls him, and Halstead goes to her, arms outstretched, after destroying a pack of cards and promising to reform. The father enters, explanations follow and he gives them his blessing.

"THE GIRL SPY BEFORE VICKSBURG."—This is another of the ever popular Kalem war stories made in the South, with the proper environments and containing the intensity of interest that has been found in all of the Kalem subjects of this nature.

The opening scene of our story shows a Union powder wagon making its way down the road, convoyed by a company of mounted Union soldiers. The route of this wagon is reported to Confederate headquarters by one of its spies. Nan, a high-spirited Southern girl, frequently employed by this department of the Confederate army, is called to headquarters and instructed to secure the destruction of the enemy's ammunition train just reported. Nan is fitted out with a Union uniform, mounted on a fast horse and sent on her journey. Previously provided with a forged order supposedly signed by a Union general which authorizes her to pass through the lines, Nan succeeds in getting through the Union lines and quickly locates the ammunition train and takes up the march with it. When night arrives the convoy goes into camp, posts its sentinels with no especial fear of danger, as they are well within the Union lines. Nan, however, watching her opportunity, slips up behind the lone sentry placed over the ammunition wagon, and having rendered him unconscious, drags him away from the wagon and takes his place. Watching her chance Nan plants a dynamite cartridge under the wagon, lights a fuse and makes a quick run out of the danger zone. Suddenly there is a loud explosion and all there is left of the ammunition wagon is a heap of charred embers. Attention is drawn to Nan while she is attempting to escape, owing to a crash in the underbrush caused by tripping her foot and falling. A pursuing party is sent out after the running spy, who has had the hardihood to perform such a daring deed. Closely pursued by Union soldiers Nan rushes through the underbrush on foot, finally reaching a nearby river, where she plunges in, diving under water, and remains there until the Union soldiers had retired from the scene. Coming up to the surface she quickly swims ashore and takes her way rapidly to the army headquarters, where she reports the successful ending of her mission, then on to her home to relieve her mother's anxiety.

This is perhaps the most hazardous feat of the plucky girl whose daring has been so admired in other Kalem Girl Spy pictures. This is positively the climax of reckless, nervy action.

"THE STRANGER."—A symbolic drama in which "Happiness," symbolized by the "Old Stranger," comes into a home of discontent and works a miracle.

An old white haired man comes walking along the dusty road. Over his back he carries a bundle slung on a cane. The back is slightly bent, but the eyes bright and kindly. The face bears a benign smile. He approaches the home of a typical Cracker family, untidy children playing on the floor, while the mother bends over the wash tub. Careless disorder and discontent permeates the entire place. The husband, just about to leave for his day's work, picks up his dinner pail, his face showing discontent in every line. His wife approaching him demands he bring home his wages in full that night. He gives a surly reply and she answers in kind. Just at this time the old stranger pauses at the open doorway, speaks cheerily to the woman within. She goes to the door as she answers him sharply, then her face softens at sight of the kindly old man, who asks if he may sit and rest awhile. Picking up a child he begins to play with it, she watching him from over her washing, pausing to look with a puzzled expression and a smile hovering over her face. The mother, impressed by the old wanderer's wonderful influence, invites him to remain and visit them. That night the husband returns slightly under the influence of liquor. His wife demands his weekly wages and is handed only a couple of dollars. This angers her and she strikes them from his hand. He, ugly from the influence of drink, raises his hand to strike. The Old Stranger appears at the door with his cheerful smile and the hand of the husband drops slowly. Both he and his wife turn to the beautiful face of the stranger, who tells the husband that his wife has been so kind as to invite him to supper. The husband asks "Who are you, old man?" to which the stranger replies, "I am only an old wanderer, taking the path where I am most needed." The Old Stranger becomes an accepted member of the family and through his influence leads the husband from his evil ways, bringing contentment to the household. When his labors are finished the little old man passes down the road on up the hill top. He looks back at the cottage containing the happy household which has been his home for a few weeks. With pleasure suffusing his face he raises his hands in a blessing and a benediction on its people, then passes on into the night.

GAUMONT.
(George Kleine.)

"THE ADVENTURESS."—A rich gentleman farmer, Mr. North by name, is discovered dictating letters to his secretary at the opening of the story. In a short time he starts on a tour of inspection about the ranch. Upon his departure we become aware that his secretary is not only devoted to him, but, in fact, loves him.

During his morning's ride North sees beside the road a motor car overturned and a lady lying, apparently senseless, beside it. He immediately returns to the farm to secure help. During his absence the lady secures a revolver and a flask of poison from her accomplice, who is hidden in a nearby wood.

North, on his return, orders the men to take her to the ranch house, where she is cared for, though the secretary seems very suspicious of her. While enjoying the hospitality of the ranch the lady does her best to gain North's love, and as she is very attractive, meets with easy success. As one feature of her plan she obtains a letter reading:

"Dear Madam—I hope you are better, and allow an old friend of the family to scold you. Accidents of the kind you have suffered have been a natural result of your going about alone and free."

This letter she hurries to show to the ranch owner in order to excite his jealousy. After some weeks have passed she receives a letter from her accomplice stating: "This evening motor place arranged; decision indispensable; must reach bank before then."

This letter she tears to bits and throws upon the ground, where it is found by the secertary, who puts the pieces together and conceives the idea that immediate action will be taken to secure money from her master. Without stating her suspicions to North, the secretary examines the baggage of the adventuress, where she finds the revolver, from which she removes the cartridges and the bottle of poison, which she empties and fills with water.

The wisdom of her action is shown that night, for during the day North receives a check for several thousand dollars drawn on the bearer. The adventuress steals the check and makes her escape upon one of the ranch horses. Timely warning from the secretary and immediate action on the part of the ranch hands makes it possible to overtake the adventuress just as she is about to enter the motor car, which has been driven to a pre-understood meeting place by her accomplice.

We can well imagine the chagrin of the plotters when they find that their only weapon has been made ineffective and they are forced to yield without an opportunity for defense. The check is recovered and the thankless woman sent on her way.

"THE DOCTOR'S SECRETARY."—The nephew, who has acted as secretary to his uncle, a man past middle life, is called away on government business which will keep him absent for some time. The old doctor employs a beautiful girl to take his place and forthwith falls in love with her. Although she cannot but appreciate the old gentleman's kindness and must needs admire him for his intellect, he makes no progress toward the winning of her affections.

Several months pass, during which he grows more and more to appreciate the companionship of his amanuensis and continues his efforts to win her love by all honorable means. On the return of the nephew he and the girl fall in love and soon marry. The uncle's heart is broken, but realizing that old age must give way to youth in the battle for a heart, contents himself by having the happy young couple live near him in his declining years.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

"A MEXICAN ROMANCE."—The pathos of a father's rebellion against fate which in this case takes the form of the love of a man for a maid—the maid being the old man's daughter—is tenderly portrayed in this story.

The dawn of love comes when the young Mexican finds a girl whose horse has thrown her, lying by a stream, her leg broken. He bears her home and the old father is full of gratitude, for since her mother's death Marguerite is all in all to him. Raymond is a welcome guest, but his frequent visits have the expected ending, and the old man surprises the two in a loving embrace. An unreasoning anger blazes up against the man who would come between him and his daughter, and Raymond is forbidden to enter the house again.

The girl pines for her lover, and the will to get well being absent, her injury grows worse. The family doctor, shrewd and kindly, soon probes to the cause of this stubborn illness, and by a few wise words brings the father to reason. He recalls Raymond, who was on the point of coming at all costs, having dreamed that his love lay dead. The two young people embrace, and love proves to be an excellent physician.

"COACHING IN DEVONSHIRE, ENGLAND."—A trip through the beautiful county of Devon in the southwestern part of England.

Devonshire is the third county in size in England and in form is very irregular, but sends out one long promontory to the south. The coast is exceedingly irregular and nearly the whole area is uneven and hilly.

We make our trip through the region near Lynmouth Harbor and Leigh Bay in a coach of the old romantic style. The horses driven by liveried grooms, and our advent announced by a pompous footman, we stop at various typical English inns to change horses and partake of refreshments.

We are impressed particularly in our trip across the country with the seeming absence of manufactories of any kind, the entire district seeming to be covered with small farms or estates, which seem arranged for beauty, pleasure and comfort. Scattered over the country are numerous large hill castles and camps, all of rough works and apparently of early English origin. The various churches which we pass prove of no small interest, not only from a historical standpoint, but from an artistic view.

When our coaching party is finished we make a short journey along the Cliffs Railway at Lynmouth, gaining a bird's eye view of the city and the bay.

PATHE FRERES.

"THE ATONEMENT."—A chemist leaving his wife to entertain one of his friends retires to his laboratory to continue with an experiment. Returning to the parlor for a second, he finds his wife resisting the enforced attentions of this so-called friend. In a minute he has turned him out of the house, but on returning to continue his work he is so flustered as to make a mistake which causes an explosion that blinds him. From that day poverty and trouble are his lot. Things get worse and worse, until at last the sheriff takes possession. This last blow occurs while the blind man is out, and almost at the same time his wife receives a letter from the friend offering to place his wealth at their disposal. He follows up the letter with a call, and for the sake of her husband the wife consents. The sheriff leaves the house encountering the blind man as he goes out. Instinct warns the poor afflicted fellow that something unusual is afoot. He asks his wife and gets only an evasive reply. His child, however, enters and runs forward to greet the old friend, calling him by name. His father, however, quickly snatches him up and then bids the other man begone, but in stretching out his arm his hand encounters the letter on the table. Picking it up he tells the child to read it, and the youngster spells it out slowly. The father listens silently, and at the finish of the letter rises and offers his hand to his friend in token of forgiveness.

"THE BOWLING FIEND."—Alfred, who has just taken to bowling, becomes a regular fiend for the game and wishes to practice on every available opportunity; in fact, he is tempted to knock over all and every upright object that may come in his path, using for this purpose any handy spherical object. Thus he seizes a ball which a youngster is using in his play, knocks over the wares of an Italian statuette dealer, a cyclist and a house decorator. Turnips and enormous pumpkins are also ravaged from stores by him, and with these projectiles he overturns a small squad of soldiers and numerous other victims. He is, however, soon suffering himself at the hands of those whom he has tormented, and they teach the enthusiast that it would be well to confine his operations in future to the bowling alley.

"THE AMERICAN IN FRENCH WATERS."—A timely view of the U. S. Squadron now in Europe steaming up the English channel. The steam launches take the sailors ashore at Cherbourg and we see officers and men placing their feet on land for the first time for many days.

"IN FULL CRY."—According to an old custom in France, an early-morning Mass precedes the meet. The ceremony over, the huntsmen and huntswomen leave the church and a general move is made to the meet. Accompanied by carriages, cyclists and onlookers on foot, they wend their way through beautiful leafy lanes. We see the meet and before long the dogs are in full cry after a fine stag, and the hunt begins in earnest. Through a big stretch of wooded country the stag bounds along, and the pack sweeps after the animal in a tightly wedged mass until the quarry takes to water. The dogs follow and finally catch up with their victim. The dead stag is then towed back and then we see the return of the hunting party to one of the fairest castles in France.

"RUNNING AWAY FROM A FORTUNE."—It is a country lawyer's office, and the lawyer has just received from his New York correspondents a copy of the will of Michael Hollihan, which leaves $10,000 to his nephew Denny, who can be identified by a cross tattooed on his wrist. The lawyer is requested to ascertain Denny's whereabouts. Placing the will in his pocket, he goes to visit the owner of a stone quarry. He finds him in charge of some blasting operations, and, unknown to the lawyer, the will drops into a box of dynamite when he takes some papers from his pockets. Meantime Denny, who is down and out, has been teaching his dog Fido to fetch and carry, and shortly after the lawyer leaves applies at the stone quarry for a job. While talking to the owner, Fido snatches what looks like a stick of dynamite from the box and starts to jump up at Denny with it. He is frightened and runs away. Fido runs after him. In turn they knock over various persons, introducing some very good comedy. Meantime the lawyer has discovered the loss of the will and has gone back to the quarry. An employee saw him drop something in the box of dynamite and tells him he thinks the dog ran off with it. The lawyer offers one hundred dollars to anyone who will catch the dog or his master. They all run to catch Denny and the dog. Finally, on tripping up, Denny is caught up by Fido, who lays the will, which was rolled up like a stick of dynamite, at his feet. The crowd of pursuers run up and Denny gets some rough handling as each try to claim the reward. Denny tells the lawyer that he saw his name on the sheet of paper. The lawyer looks and sees the cross tattooed on Denny's wrist. All now overwhelm him with cangratulations.

"CATALAN, THE MINSTREL."—The fame of Catalan, the famous minstrel of Queen Beatrice of Savoy, was known far and wide. King Phillip of France, desiring to hear him, asked his fair cousin if she would send him to his court for a short while. Beatrice acceded to the desire of Phillip and despatched

Catalan, entrusting to his care some rare Eastern perfumes as a present for the king. At the approach to Paris, Catalan ascertained from a peasant girl, Juliette, the spot where the archers who were to meet him were located. Desirous of obtaining the perfumes, the archers provoked a quarrel with Catalan and killed him. They returned to Paris and told the King that they had not met his guest. Left dying in the woods, the minstrel was found by Juliette, and he with his last breath begged her to carry to the King,

One Way of Curing An Indifferent Husband

WINNING BACK HIS LOVE

Most women in the same position with Mrs. Wallace would have resorted to just the opposite methods adopted by her when she found her husband's love waning. Still it was not through her own volition, but the advice of a friend. The husband is paying too much attention to a show girl of the city theatre, and when the wife learns of this attachment she is heartbroken. A friend of the family suggests to apparently pay him back in his own coin, they occupying an adjoining table in a cafe to which the husband has escorted the girl. This proves to be a reflex of his own perfidy, awakening him to a full realization of the value of his wife's love and curing him of his weakness for all time. Approximate length, 994 feet.

HIS WIFE'S SWEETHEARTS

This is a very funny comedy in which the generosity of a husband proved disastrous. He presents his wife with a handsome hat and coat. These are surreptitiously worn by the maid-servants while walking with their beaux. Hubby, of course, thinks the wearer of the clothes his wife, and as there were three maids he has a lot of trouble doled out to him. Approximate length, 682 feet.

Queen Beatrice's written message. The king, at the girl's earnest request, gave her audience and learned of his archers' treachery. He immediately confronted his archers and accused them of the death of the bard.

They denied their guilt, forgetting that the perfumes they had spread on their hair and garments irrefutably proclaimed them as the assasins. The King ordered swift punishment to be meted out to them and had a cross erected over the spot where the famous minstrel had been so cruelly slain. Juliette, who had been struck by the minstrel's handsome appearance, mourned him more than any and came frequently to the cross to pray.

"CARNIVAL OF JAPANESE FIREMEN IN TOKIO."—An excellent picture of interest inasmuch as it shows how different are the customs of the Orient to those we ourselves are acquainted with.

"THE YAQUI GIRL."—A Mexican troubador, Pedro, and his sister are singing and playing in the streets for a livelihood. An Indian girl of the Yaqui tribe, by name Silver Arrow, is fascinated by the handsome Mexican. She follows him when he goes to play in front of the old convent, and is delighted when he exchanges a few words with her. Passing a flower seller, she buys a bunch of roses, and proceeding to the cottage where the handsome Pedro is sitting in the garden, she watches her opportunity when he goes inside for a minute, to lay the flowers, tied with a band taken from her hair, on his chair. Watching from behind a wall, she sees him take a rose and pin it on his coat. She then sees his sweetheart Marguerita come up and kiss him, and seeing the flower, she accuses him of deceiving her. She soon forgives Pedro and vents her jealousy by trampling on the flowers. Silver Arrow is morose, and seeing that she is not preferred to Marguerita, swears vengeance. A few days later the Indian maid is up in a tree recovering a bird she has shot with her arrow, when Pedro comes along disguised as a cowboy. Keeping quiet, she sees him hold up the express messenger as he rides along, and taking the booty, hide it among some shrubs. Stealing up to the cottage, she is about to stab Marguerita with a dagger when Pedro in the nick of time shoots it out of her hand. She denounces Pedro as a bandit and goes on her way. Marguerita ascertains from Pedro that the Yaqui girl's words are true, and insists that they must prevent the girl from informing the authorities. They follow after her, and soon catching up, overpower her and bind her flat on the back of a large white horse without bridle or saddle. They send him with his burden towards the boundless prairie. An Indian on a hill sees the horse and rushes to a nearby camp and obtains the aid of the cowboys, who are celebrating a roundup. They all mount and after a long chase one of the boys managers to lasso the white horse. Unbound, Silver Arrow tells her story and they all proceed to the Mexican's cottage. He sees them coming, led by the Indian girl, and knows that all is up. Shots are exchanged, but with so many against him, Pedro is soon riddled with bullets. Marguerita falls and weeps over his body and as she turns and sees Silver Arrow, says: "This is your work; see what you have done." But the Indian girl, satisfied at her revenge, without a tremor replies: "I swore if I no have him, you no have him."

the Continent, wherever shown, it is received with acclaim.

Harry A. Spoor is a big favorite with film men, and the Essanay office in London is made the headquarters for people interested in the licensed film industry from all quarters of the globe. He is as busy as the proverbial nailer, so Robert says, and has all the business that he can attend to.

Great Work Done by "Red Cross Seal."

The opening exhibitions of the "Red Cross Seal" in Chicago theatres have created intense interest in the country-wide campaign waged against tuberculosis. Dr. Evans, of the city health department, and Frank E. Wing and M. L. Dorr, of the Chicago Tuberculosis Institute, have been straining every nerve to make the exhibitions valuable to those in attendance.

Dr. Evans has even gone so far as to arrange with the managers of theatres where the film is scheduled to be shown for the delivery of a short lecture by some physician whom he has specially detailed for that purpose.

Messrs. Wing and Dorr have done all in their power to give the film and the dates of its presentations in various theatres as wide publicity as possible. They are more than gratified by the prompt and generous manner in which the picture theatre public has responded to the appeal made for support, by purchasing Red Cross Seal Christmas stamps. The theatre managers have aided in every way and have permitted the sale of stamps in the auditoriums.

Through the courtesy of Aaron Jones, of the Orpheum theatre, two Red Cross nurses sold $125 worth of stamps on the date of presentation there. At the Ideal, on North avenue, George Gilmore, manager, $25 was taken in; at the Glamour, Sixty-third street and Wentworth avenue, John Miller, manager, $20 was taken in, and an equal amount at the Washington theatre, Forty-third street and Cottage Grove ave., through the co-operation of Manager Whelan.

In outside cities, where the film is booked for the near future, unusual preparations are being made to produce a lasting impression on the minds of all who view it in connection with the war on the "white plague."

Oil King Is Largest Red Cross Seal Buyer.

John D. Rockefeller is the largest purchaser of Red Cross seals in the United States. His order, filled by the New York Red Cross Society, was for 50,000, which will be pasted on mail matter sent out by the Standard Oil Company.

"Dreamland" Car Travels "Rocky Road."

The Dreamland picture touring car, making its way and paying its way from Kewanee, Ill., to Amarillo, Tex., was having considerable trouble when last heard of in the Ozark mountains, Mo. The rocky roads are very hard on the tires and the party has to progress very slowly.

At Rolla, Mo., the party showed two nights in the opera house to packed audiences. At this point they met with their greatest success since leaving Kewanee. Up to the present time the travelers have been able to cover all expenses of the trip. After spending several weeks more in Missouri they will go into Arkansas, then on into Texas, where they will have completed their journey. It will be more than a month before they return to Kewanee. The party consists of Mrs. Chris. Taylor and son, Walter, William Wind and William Avery.

Chicago Brevities.

The new Star theatre, Lincoln, Ill., was opened by Eiler Jones on Dec. 10, to overflowing audiences. Many favorable comments were made on the neat and tasteful interior decorations and on the attractive and comfortable surroundings. A fine program furnished by the American branch of the G. F. Co. gave great satisfaction.

W. G. Krouse, of Wyoming, Ia., called at the American branch of the G. F. Co., 77 S. Clark street, last week, and arranged for licensed service. He also purchased a machine and supplies. Mr. Krouse is at present constructing a new theatre, the name of which is not yet known, and will open it New Year's eve.

Thomas Wienig, manager and owner of the Electric theatre, Thirty-first street and Lowe avenue, this city, who gave the "independent" product a trial for two weeks, returned a very much chastened man to the General Film Co., at 77 S. Clark street, to arrange for a licensed service.

E. Pretchold and L. Hartman, of the Pastime Amusement Co., Milwaukee, opened their new theatre, the Pastime, Saturday, December 17, to capacity business. The Pastime cost $10,000. Messrs. Pretchold and Bartman are getting their service from the General Film Co., at 77 S. Clark street.

Charles Lynch, of Spring Valley, Ill., opened a new picture theatre in that town recently, and contracted for service with the G. F. Co., at 77 S. Clark street.

Ben Snyder, manager and owner of the Grand theatre, Blue Island, Ill., threw the "independent" product overboard Monday, December 19, and arranged to get his bookings from the G. F. Co., at 77 S. Clark street. Ben says that the "independent" film has too many spectators in the pictures and no actors. He thinks that such pictures could be taken any day in the week on the sidewalks of any country town.

A. L. Svendson, manager of the Empire theatre, Fort Madison, Ia., saw the Bio advertisement on the last page of The Film Index of the issue of Dec. 24, and immediately wired for 1000 Bio carbons to the G. F. Co., 85 Dearborn street. Manager F. C. Aiken of the G. F. Co. tells me that Mr. Svendson is one of the oldest and most reliable exhibitors in the Middle West.

J. C. Cerny, manager of the Victoria theatre, 2811 W. Twenty-second street, this city, who for two years was a stanch supporter and user of "independent" film, took on service at 85 Dearborn street, Monday, December 19. Manager Cerny concluded in the long run that his box-office receipts will be best conserved by licensed service.

The Greenland theatre, 3022 W. Madison street, E. T. Hess, manager, found it necessary to change from "independent" to the licensed service in order to save their business. The Greenland has been using the "independent" product for several months and business has been gradually dwindling. Manager Hess took on service with the G. F. Co., 85 Dearborn street, Monday, December 19.

Mr. Kanowsky, manager of the Fifty-first street theatre, was enticed a short time ago by wily "independent" agents to take on that service. After two weeks he found that he required a restoring tonic and immediately arranged for a good quality service with the G. F. Co., at 85 Dearborn street.

A. M. Dallas, manager of the Royal theatre, 1321 Milwaukee avenue, and of the Jefferson theatre, Forty-third street and Jefferson avenue, has severed his connection with the "independents," and is now a booster for the service of the G. F. Co., at 85 Dearborn street. Manager Dallas had two first runs daily of the "independent" product, but his patrons scoffed at the display and demanded a better program. Manager Dallas is considered one of the most enterprising and wide-awake exhibitors in the city. His coming out so decisively in favor of the licensed product should convince many of the wavering ones of the vast superiority of licensed film.

Eric Morrison, general manager of the American Picture Machine Co., New York City, which manufactures the Standard projecting machine, was in the city last week on business.

R. E. Garber, owner and manager of the Victoria theatre, 6902 Wentworth avenue, is now being furnished with service by the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co. Mr. Garber formerly took service from the H. & H. Co., "independent." He started the licensed booking Tuesday, December 20.

G. W. Burnside, manager of the Idle Hour theatre, Neenah, Wis., who formerly got his service from the Western Film Exchange, Milwaukee, an "independent" concern, started service with the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co., Sunday, December 18. He also arranged for the Lyric, Appleton, Wis., another house owned by him. The "independent" service did not please patrons and a change was necessary to keep the houses open.

G. W. Ley, manager of the Empire theatre, South Bend, Ind., called at the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co., one day last week and arranged for service for the reopening of his house, after remodeling.

George Friedman, manager of the Electric theatre, 1302 S. Halsted street, this city, contracted with the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co., Monday, December 19, for a first run service costing $125 weekly.

The Nugent Bros., of Kaukauna, Wis., formerly clients of the Western Film Exchange, Milwaukee, have arranged to take service from the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co., on December 25. This is another case where the "independent" film failed to give satisfaction.

H. A. Templeton, manager of the Vaudette theatre, St. Joe, Mich., started service with the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co. on December 20. Mr. Templeton was getting his service from Laemmle, but it lasted only three weeks.

Theodore C. Eichenbaum, owner of the splendid new Oak theatre, on Armitage and Western avenues, and who was receiving his service from the Laemmle exchange, severed his connections Thursday, December 15, and is now getting service from the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co., at 435 N. Clark street, this city. The Oak theatre seats 1,500 people and is considered one of the finest on the West Side.

George H. Nestles, formerly owner of the Bon Ton theatre, Thirty-first street and Indiana avenue, contemplates re-entering the exhibiting business in the early spring. Mr. Nestles has always been a strong supporter of the licensed product.

W. H. Bell, manager of the Spoor branch of the G. F. Co., this city, was all smiles the other day when I called. In front of him was placed a handsome eight-day clock in attractive dome brass case, the Christmas gift of the employees in that office. W. H. Bomb, assistant manager, made a neat presentation speech, to which Mr. Bell replied in happy vein.

I have been much struck by the neat and timely envelope gotten up by the head of the Essanay advertising department for Christmas time. The envelope referred to is of the size used to mail bulletins of film subjects. It cannot fail to attract attention, and will bring out strongly the Essanay Christmas film subject, "A Bad Man's Christmas."

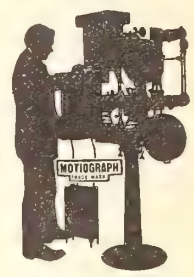
THE REASON WHY

THE MOTIOGRAPH

Projects a much better picture than other machines is because it is the only one with a

PATENTED DOUBLE CONE SHUTTER

This shutter does what others will not do, because it shortens the time by two-thirds on both the opening and closing of the aperture.
The result is a much more brilliant picture and no flicker to tire the eyes.



NO OTHER MACHINE HAS THE DOUBLE CONE SHUTTER IT IS PATENTED AND BELONGS TO THE MOTIOGRAPH EXCLUSIVELY

HOME-MADE ANNOUNCEMENT SLIDES.

The making of slides for announcing feature reels is but little work if one is able to use the camera. The camera to be used should be provided with sufficient draw of bellows to be able to copy full size or nearly so. Personally I use my 8x10 camera fitted with my 3¼x4¼ Kodak lense. The plate holders is kitted so as to take a regular lantern slide plate 3¼x4.

Having arranged your camera for the work at hand the matter for the slide is your next consideration. The advertisements of the various film makers appearing in The Film Index can by judicious use of the shears and paste pot be arranged to make fine copy for slides. The advertisements as whole are well displayed and the headlines are in fine bold type, which make them especially desirable, producing very distinct slides. In many instances the advertisement is so well arranged and displayed all that has to be done is to add the date the picture is to be featured. This you can do with a pen or brush or better still use the smallest gummed letters made by the Tablet and Ticket Company. Don't try to put too much on the slide, as you get better results with little matter well arranged.

Having fixed your copy for the slide according to your fancy, fasten it on a board that has been lined off in inch squares so that you can center the copy and thus avoid trouble when you focus the camera. The board should be placed square and centered with the camera. Mark off on the ground glass the exact size of a lantern plate and make a cross in the center with a lead pencil. This will be found of great convenience to properly center the copy on the slide. Before making exposure see that copy is evenly lighted. Place near a window and use a piece of white paper or card board to reflect light on the shadow side or the part farthest from the light. Make normal exposure for the white or the background of the copy. Develop as hard as possible so as to get a good, crisp negative.

I find in making these slides that, as a rule, they are not as dense as I would like. I then intensify the slide by bleaching it in a solution of Bichloride of Mercury and then washing. A few drops of strong Ammonia is added to a little water and the slide placed in this until it turns very black. The plate is thoroughly washed and then dried. This gives you a negative slide of your copy, that is to say, that the white parts of the copy is now black and the black parts or letter is clear glass. You will find that this makes a more desirable slide than if you go to the additional trouble and expense to make a positive from the negative by contact.

As a rule only one slide is needed, so the negative will fill the bill. Of course, if you should copy a portrait or a picture you would then be required to make a positive slide by contact. If you wish to make the negative slide still more attractive you can get a ten-cent package of Japanese transparent water colors and apply whatever color you fancy to the clear parts or the wording and get fine results. This does not require particular care, as it does not make any difference if the color goes into the black, as it will not show on the screen.

After the slide is dry take a binding strip that can be obtained from any photo supply house and matt or mark out the part of the parts of the slide not to be shown. One strip usually answers. Place a clean cover glass over the matted part of the slide and bind together. It is not necessary to bind the slide all around, as the slide is only used for a few days, when it has served its purpose. After it is of no further use you can put it into water to soak and then be cleaned easily, then used as cover glass for other slides. A slide of this kind if developer is saved from time to time should not cost more than five or six cents. The developer will keep well if put in small bottles and filled to the top and if you lack a little developer to fill the bottle use a little water.

PATHE WESTERN DRAMA

"The Yaqui Girl." Full of Action and Sensations

A WESTERN drama with plenty of thrilling and sensational right A La Mazeppa is released this week, under the title of "Yaqui Girl," by Pathe Freres. This is a product of Pathe's California company, and from this sample of the work being done by that company some excellent pictures may be looked for from the same source in the future.

The story is of an Indian girl of the Yaqui tribe, who becomes enamored of a Mexican troubadour. The Mexican has a sweetheart, but this does not stop him from flirting with the Indian girl, and when the latter discovers the other woman she attempts to stab her, but Pedro saves his sweetheart's life by shooting the dagger out of the Indian girl's hand.

It happens that the Mexican, Pedro, is a highwayman. He holds up and robs the mail carrier. The Indian girl sees him and afterwards announces him as a bandit before his sweetheart. After the Indian girl leaves, Pedro and his sweetheart decide that they must prevent her informing the authorities, and catch her and then tie her to the back of a horse. The horse and his burden is turned loose upon the prairie. The spectacle of the horse dashing across the prairie with a girl tied to his back is quite thrilling and as realistic as could be desired. An Indian discovers the girl on the horse and securing aid from a nearby camp of cowboys, a thrilling chase and capture follows. When the Indian girl tells her story the party goes after the Mexican bandit and a gun fight occurs in which the bandit is killed. Real Indians and cowboys amid real western scenes strengthen the realism of this subject.

finishing trades in the course of a few days. It will present a very fine front to George street, and when completed I will give the readers of The Film Index a full description of this new addition to our theatres that is to be devoted exclusively to the exploitation of motion pictures. There are at the present time rumors in circulation as regards Mr. Spencer building a studio for the manufacture of locally made films, and the senior morning paper of this city gave an elaborate account of the artists and the wonderful things that were in store for the Australians at the hands of Mr. Spencer, but so far that is all that I have heard, and as soon as I get anything authentic I will advise your readers, but I think on the whole it has so far been more "hot air" than anything definite being done.

There is a company in Sydney that is building a studio, but that is not Mr. Spencer's or they are in no wise connected with him, in the making of original films, and I presume will "dupe" a good film now and then, if there is a shortage of films, but then they may not do so, and just as soon as their products are on the market I will report on them both from the artistic and photographic point of view. There is no reason why there should not be good work done out here, as the atmosphere for photographic work has no superior in any part of the world, and reminds me of the light of California which is considered the finest in the world, but I do not think that it is one whit better than this part of the world. This is surely a land of sunshine all right, and too much so to suit the writer, for out here you can boil, roast or bake, for fully eight months of the year, and the other four months are hot enough for me at the very coldest.

I have not seen Mr. Spencer since he came back from the States, but that is my fault and not his, as I have not been down to his theatre for some months, as I can see all that I wish without getting down so far in the city, and both he and West's people show pretty much the same pictures each week, fully seven-eighths are exactly thesa me subjects, and as I live not very far from West's, it is much easier to drop in there, which I do religiously once a week and see what there is that is new and interesting, and then I have a very great weakness for the music at West's, which is of the very best and nothing approachinfi it is to be heard in any other show in the city.

The New Kings theatre was opened a few weeks ago by Mr. A. A. Elisdon, who is in the film business, and the managing director of "Elisdon's Limited" but the films that they handle are some of the outside lines and they are seldom or never seen on the screens of the other theatres. He seems to be running a lot of the Powers company's films and he is running his show on the continuous line from eleven to eleven. He has a fine theatre, but to my mind very badly planned, and I must say that the one who is responsible for the planning of it evidently had no experience in theatrical work, and I am sorry to say, that some of the theatres in this country are laid out with no regard to what is called the line of vision, and I have yet to learn that light travels any way but in straight lines, and that you cannot see round corners.

The writer who has been experimenting on the lines of stereoscopic work in the motion picture business, has succeeded far beyond his most sanguine expectations, and am now ready to apply for patents in the United States, England, France and also Germany, Canada and Australia, and I hope to add my name to those that have made the motion picture the source of delight and pleasure to millions and millions of people that not only have derived pleasure, but education as well; and when they see the figures stand out like in real life, then they will derive much more interest and pleasure in them, and a new lease of life will be added to the business.

This I can do, and this I have got very nearly perfect, and which will not add as far as the cost of manufacture is concerned, much to the cost of making of the machine do this work.

AUSTRALIAN NOTES.

(From Another Correspondent.)

During the current month the general state elections and climate changes in the weather have in no way retarded the picture business generally which now has become such an education and amusement for the public, that it is like unto a rock, that weathers all storms, which time or period cannot change or deteriorate.

"Spencer's are on the top rung of the ladder, and who can get higher?" they say in their advertisement, and it is quite apropos. The Lyceum is frequented by all classes, from the Governor General to the humblest citizen and his usually large family.

Coming away from the popular Lyceum one evening, I heard a flattering remark from the vast audience who were leaving the building. Nothing but praise—and deservedly so. The program—an excellent one, is as follows: "The Arnst-Barry Boat Race," "Heart Rose," "The Stolen Submarine," "Family Fued," "An Arcadian Maid," "Little Mother at the Baby Show," "Out of the Night," "Italian Artillery," "A Trip Through Berlin," "Troublesome Adventure," "Foolshead in the Lion's Cage," "Mercy of the Dust," are pictures treated with fine orchestral music and scenic effects, that in many instances, life is portrayed on the screen with such fidelity that it almost speaks, although it is silent.

In the program there was included a local subject, the combined opening of the Prince Albert Yacht and Sydney Sailing Clubs. These are governed by the bon-ton of Australian society, and on the occasion, every available craft in its holiday colors is brought into service. Mr. Spencer's experts succeeded in capturing a magnificent series on one of the brightest of our bright sunny days. This film was of great interest, and met with an ovation at its presentation.

Mr. Spencer is now landing, so I am informed, some of his many purchases made on his recent tour of the world. They embrace novelties for the picture trade, which will keep his staff extra busy for some time to come, supplying his large clientele.

West's pictures continue their marked success at the Glacarium. I paid them a visit, and must say, their show is a "ripping one." The program was as follows: "Tontolini Somersaults," "Nantes and Its Surroundings," "Italian Artillery," "Transport in India," and many others. The fine orchestra is the great attraction. They report good business in all their branches.

The Bijou, under the West management, is doing a good business. I havent' had time to look them up, but reports speak favorably.

There are other shows in the city and suburbs, I believe, and all are on the right side of the ledger.

West's contemplate building a new picture palace in the Eastern Suburb. The position may be thought a good one, but it's not to my fancy. It is said that it will accommodate 2,400 and be up-to-date.

Spencer's Lyric is growing, and from what I saw the other day, it will be a fine building, with all modern improvements. The no post system is a grand one. When completed I shall send you a full description of the house.

New Castle.

New Castle and outlying districts report good business. This is generally. Spencer's Olympia, Melbourne, and West's building are doing capacity business, their large halls, being crowded nightly.

Queensland.

Birch & Carroll, Cook all give the same news, things O. K.

Just as I am closing my notes, Lennon, Hyman and Lennon wire me, crowded houses nightly. Spencer supplies us every film up-to-date and satisfactorily.

POLO, ILL., HAS A PHOTOPLAY THEATRE.

George Robertson and Joseph Galvin, of Dixon, Ill., have opened a photoplay theatre at Polo, where they report of doing an excellent business. Polo is a hustling little town, which had no amusements whatever until Messrs. Robertson and Galvin came there.

If business continues to improve, it is expected that the young managers will build a theatre of their own in the near future.

SONG SLIDE RELEASES

Synopsis of Productions by the Leading Song Slide Manufacturers

RELEASED THIS WEEK.

Scott & Van Altena.

"DREAMS, JUST DREAMS."—By Irving Berlin & Ted Snyder; published by Ted Snyder Co., New York. There are many "dream" songs on the market just now, but when the above authors set their names to a selection, we can expect something entirely out of the ordinary. The fact that the publishers are pushing it more than the ordinary song would indicate that they recognize in it a decided hit. The slides are all novelties of the usual high order of Scott & Van Altena, and combine charming grace of pose and resplendent coloring.

"WHEN YOU'RE IN WRONG WITH THE RIGHT GIRL."—Lyric by Gus Kahn; music by Grace Le Boy; published by the Kedzie Music Co., Chicago. The very title of this song appeals to one's sense of humor. Who hasn't experienced just such a situation? Slides by Scott & Van Altena characteristically portray originality and beauty in every detail. Photography and coloring are good. To be in right, get this set.

"STAR OF MY DREAMS, SHINE ON!"—Lyric by Arthur J. Lamb; music by John T. Hall; published by Chas. K. Harris, New York. This song, already a hit, is heard wherever one goes. Its success is not problematical, but proven. As for slides, what better guarantee than that Scott & Van Altena are their sponsors? Their exceptional skill is noticeable in every slide.

The following songs released last week by Scott & Van Altena were published by mistake among the releases of De Witt C. Wheeler:

"GLIDING O'ER THE SNOW."—Words by W. L. Werden; melody by K. V. Bowers and published by the Harold Rossiter Music Co., of Chicago. A very appropriate song for this time of the year. A tuneful melody treating of the joys of sleigh riding. The pictures are exceedingly pretty and the models exceptional ones. Novelties, too, as usual, adorn the set, making in all a set far from the ordinary.

"I NEVER KNEW TILL NOW."—By Chas. K. Harris and published by him. A descriptive ballad by that well known writer and publisher, whose songs always sell well. The slides for this song are exceptionally fine, there being some entirely new ideas in pictorial effect—while new, still beautiful—not merely freaks—a fine set.

"SHOW ME THE WAY TO FRISCO."—Words by Jack Mahoney; music by Theo. Morse; published by Theodore Morse Music Co. A cow boy song with snappy tuneful music, illustrated with breezy pictures, with fine western settings. The atmosphere of the great West is surely well portrayed in this fine and novel set of slides.

De Witt C. Wheeler.

"I'M A MARRIED MAN."—Words by Ballard Macdonald; music by Harry Carroll; published by Jos. W. Stern & Co. A purely comic song both in lyrics and melody—up to the standard in every way. If you have any false ideas of the joys of married life get this set and they will soon be shattered. This married man had to hold the baby, wash the dishes, stay home evenings and other things equally obnoxious to a self-respecting man. If you're in the same boat, you'll sympathize with him; if you're a free lance, you'll have the laugh on an unfortunate brother; if you're betrothed you may see what you are coming to. At any rate, see this set.

"I'LL BE RIGHT HERE IN THE SAME OLD PLACE."—Words and music by Billy Kent; published by Shapiro. A song on a new theme, which is more than welcome in this era of new ideas. The slides are in every way masterpieces of their kind. They illustrate perfectly the lyrics and show the originality and degree of perfection attained by this firm in the manufacture of song slides. The color effects in this set are especially commendable.

Alfred T. Simpson.

"TIPPERARY TWIRL."—Words by Jack Drislane; music by Geo. W. Meyer; published by F. B. Haviland Pub. Co., N. Y. This is a clever song with good clean humor, such as is demanded by all the picture theatres. Simpson has posed his stock company models to great effect in a clever series of situations.

"SKIPPER SUSIE GREENE."—Written and composed by the celebrated author, Don Ramsay, author of "Some Day When Dreams Come True," "You Look Just Like a Girl I Used to Know," "The Star of Love is Burning in My Heart for You"; published by Walter Jacobs, Boston, Mass. A pretty story is told in this tuneful little melody. The children sailing their toy boat gave a great chance for artistic pictures and exquisite coloring. The second verse shows the return of the sailor to his home by the sea—some marine scenes that are very worthy. This is considered by Simpson to be one of the best sets of slides he has ever made.

Levi Company, Inc.

"THAT'S GOING SOME FOR YOU."—Words by Al Bryan; music by Fred Fisher; published by Shapiro. A great novelty song with an exceptional lyric. Some of the little things this hero would do for his girl—conquer tigers, elephants, lions, whales, and then sit upon a carpet tack and ride around the world and back. That "zoo" business is all right, but that "carpet tack" thing—"That's going some." Just imagine the slide possibilities of this song and see the set Levi Co. turned out and you'll be agreeably surprised.

"I'M LOOKING FOR A DEAR OLD LADY."—Words by Edgar Selden; music by Tom Kelly. This is another one of Shapiro's that has made good. As an illustrated song it is in a class by itself. The title, the subject, and the beautiful pictures make it a big attraction everywhere.

Excelsior Slide Co.

"LUCKY BOY."—Words and music by Kendis and Paley; published by Kendis & Paley, New York. A Western song posed in typical cowboy costume. The set contains many beautiful western prairie scenes and is colored vividly and true to nature.

"HAS ANYBODY GOT A KISS TO SPARE."—Words by Gus Kahn; music by Grace Le Boy; published by Will Rossiter, Chicago. It concerns the adventures of a young man who is looking for a kiss. Does he get it? Yes, and many of them, as is portrayed in this set of slides.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

"The Tale of Two Cities" is progressing marvellously. The first reel has been completed, the second is now under way, and we can look for the early release of this remarkable dramatic and magnificent production of Dicken's great story of love and self-sacrifice, the subjection of the masses and the elevation of the aristocracy. The amount of care given to the picture is wonderful. The old coach used is an antique, over a hundred years old, with the earmarks of the eighteenth century and historical associations, imported from Europe, used by Presidents Washington, Lincoln and many of the nobility who have visited this country.

"Vitagraph Nights" have become so extremely fashionable that it is impossible to suplpy the demand for the feature stars, Miss Florence E. Turner and Mr. Maurice Costello. They are limited in the number of nights that can be given to these special evenings. All these must be arranged directly with the Vitagraph Company.

During the past month Miss Turner and Mr. Costello gave four nights each, crowding the theatres to an overflow, and in every instance the reception given and the courtesies and appreciation shown by the audience and the managers were liberal and sincere.

Chris. C. Taylor, of the Dreamland Theatre, Keewanee, Ill., is starting a company of seven people in his seven passenger touring car for the great Southwest. They expect to stop at convenient points and show Vitagraph films only on this tour, closing the trip, barring accident, at Amarillo, Texas.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin" will be their feature; "The Children's Revolt" and "A Double Elopement" and other Vitagraphs of the same kind, on a wager of $700. This company agrees to start from the Dreamland Theatre in Keewanee and make this trip, using no money only what they can make en route. The company start out with enough gasoline and oil to last them one hundred miles. They have a right to stop where they please and show wherever they can get a date.

This is banking on Life Portrayals with the assured confidence of success, and if we are any sort of prophet they will win the wager and a nice little surplus besides. There is no question as to the Vitagraph popularity and their success.

A Merry Christmas and a Happy New York to all will be "Clancy," on Friday, Dec. 23, and "Jean and the Waif," on Saturday, Dec. 24. "Clancy" is so natural and so in touch with us that we are in sympathy with his Christmas experience and follow him through it with the keenest interest, and when it is all over we have a higher estimation of our bluecoated defenders and the whole police department. Exposures and dangers come to them on Christmas Day as well as other days, but Clancy manages to live through it and has a Happy New Year.

"Jean and the Waif" is going to please everyone on Christmas, particularly the youngsters. The acting dog, "Jean," and the child, who is the wonder of motion pictures, add to the sentiment and the beauty of this Christmas Life Portrayal.

At the rehearsal of one of the scenes of "The Tale of Two Cities," a young boy who was visiting the Vitagraph studios said very confidentially to one of the players of thirty years' experience: "Say, mister, that was fine; you ought to be an actor."

$1,000 FOR HALLBERG ECONOMIZER.

Among the many gratifying letters of recommendation which Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," is daily receiving with reference to his Standard Economizer for Moving Picture Theatres, the following is a unique sample:

Cumberland, Md., Dec. 17, 1910.

Dear Sir: The Economizer was duly received, and to say it is giving satisfaction would be expressing it mildly. It is worth its price for improvement on light alone. Would not take $1,000 for it today if I could not replace it. Your truly, (Signed) JOHN J. KIRK.

BLUE HORSE MINE

The throb of strenuous effort that overcomes obstacles runs through this virile tale and marks it for splendid success with any audience. A grateful Indian, two men, a girl, a mine and a Marathon race figure in the absorbing plot. The Indian wins the race and turns the prize money over to the white man to develop the mine and thereby win the consent of the girl's father to their marriage.

THE LUBIN BELL MEANS THE BEST

Released Monday, January 2. Length about 950 feet.

ART and the LEGACY

Rarely do you see humor and love interest so charmingly combined as in this pretty story of two artists—a young man and woman—who thought they were "wedded to art" but found out their mistake and became wedded to each other. Of course, neither could paint worth a continental, but they both thought they could and they were never, never going to marry. Cupid, however, won out against the two of them without much effort and in a very novel way, as the story shows. "The Film Index" contained an interesting article on this film last week.
